An Improper Symposium

Is beauty the purpose of art, or is a moral element required? And does this relate to spiritual health? Discuss.

Plato: Art clouds truth, in which case its purpose is immoral.

Oscar Wilde: But beauty is truth.

Leo Tolstoy: Then explain the point of foundation creams. No, the purpose of art is moral instruction.

Me: Oh, balls. Despite boring protestations from my flayed, whimpering conscience, there is no relation between art and morality. Beauty in itself is always enough. To insist on an instructive purpose is to miss the meaning of Padma Lakshmi's physique. Yes, she can teach you to make coconut-curried mahi mahi. But that's not why she's on television.

Others: Yes, it all makes sense now!

Me: And spiritual health just means top-shelf vodka.

Glad to have that settled. Anyway, I have, of late, lost all my girth. Struck with a clap of mid-life crisis, I panicked and dropped a bunch of pants sizes. While this makes me eminently less employable as a William Howard Taft impersonator, I do feel more confident. Hence the grossly pompous idea of referencing Plato, Tolstoy and Wilde in my letter.

In this issue, Amanda Knorr takes a lot of gym classes and, to learn why he's so beautiful, Jonathan Soroff traces his DNA. Truth, of course, is relative.

Smashing Squash

In our part of the world, where pumpkins are usually destined for pies or the inside of ravioli, kaddo makes a sweet change of pace. Afghan restaurant Ariana serves a thick slab of pumpkin pan-fried, then baked with sugar until its flavor concentrates and the flesh turns fork-tender. To cut through the sweetness, a garlicky yogurt sauce—and, if you prefer, a savory ground beef sauce—spills over the top.

GINGER BLUES

But Yeo has big plans.

GINGER PARK MAY BE closed, but chef Patricia Yeo remains. She says she's going to "take a deep breath and start the process all over again," with a new restaurant in the same South End neighborhood.

Yeo won't say where exactly, but "we're hoping to reopen in May." Who's we? Explains Yeo, "I'm hoping to take two of my cooks with me. It was a really good staff." Yeo describes the as-yet-unnamed project as "a lot more casual" than its predecessor.

I SHALL RETURN
Patricia Yeo

Although Yeo made her reputation in New York, and is heading to Hong Kong for a six-week consulting gig, she makes it clear that she's put down roots in Boston. "People have been amazingly warm," she says, adding that she's launched some friendships she hopes will last a lifetime.

MORE CAMBRIDGE NEWS: Greg Boschetti is the new executive chef at Temple Bar in Porter Square. It's a deserved promotion for the man credited with creating some of the restaurant's most popular dishes (like the yuzu citrus tuna tartar with avocado mousse). Boschetti started his stint there as sous chef before rising to chef de cuisine under Michael Scelfo, who's jumped to Russell House Tavern.

DON'T GET EXCITED JUST YET—the sign is finally up, but Floating Rock's opening in Central Square is on hold due to unspecified "financial issues." We'll keep you posted.... Annabelle's in Hyde Park has opened where CF Donovan's was "almost open" for several years.

What are some ways to create a memorable look to stand out in a crowd?

ASK THE EXPERT

"THE KABUKI SOCIALITE"

A: I think you've got to have your hairdresser create a unique look. Hair is the first thing people notice, and you need to stand out! Everyone looks the same. It doesn't need to be extreme or something you can't maintain, just different. A great makeup artist is also key. David Nicholas created the look that I've become known for. He wanted people to remember me, and did they ever. If you want to stand out, you have to be willing to accept remarks that people say about you. People are going to talk. Everything should be coordinated, from your hair to your makeup to your fashion. And a little dog doesn't hurt. Just as long as it's well-groomed and accessorized. No one wants to look at a mangy mutt. KYLE WRIGHT

Work It Out

After going all out for my gym story (page 28), I needed the perfect treatment to complement my hard work. The new Extreme Sports Massage at Bliss was major motivation when I thought my arms would snap from another set of push-ups, or my core would implode from one more plank pose. When I arrived to receive the treatment, my technician asked if I were sore anywhere. "Everywhere" wasn't an option, so I chose my shoulders, where she placed a parafango mud pack for 10 minutes to heat up my muscles. Once that was peeled off, I received a targeted massage, designed to work out kinks and knots in my neck, shoulders and upper back. The slow, deep method proved a nice change from Swedish, and is particularly effective for cold-weather runners and winter sport athletes who suffer from overworked quads, hamstrings and lower backs. Nothing too painful is involved, but like marathons or ski jumps, it's not for sissies, either.

AMANDA KNORR

Going Out

Inhibition Killer

"Tequila is definitely the new connoisseur's drink," says Stephanie Jamison, co-owner of Lolita Cocina and Tequila Bar. "People want to understand it." If the recent surge in bars specializing in the hangover-inducer is any indication, she's right. In addition to Lolita, there's Papagãyo in Fort Point, while Michael Schlow's Tico is set to launch in the Back Bay before spring. But similarities between the three—beyond slinging fire water—are few.

At Lolita, the endgame is to get lost in a wicked atmosphere cultivated with glowing red lights and dark corners. It looks gothic and sleek, with digitized Latin beats blaring through speakers and silent film projections dancing on the exposed brick walls. "We loved the underground feel," says Jamison. "It's the kind of place you can let loose in."

The construction of the space is nearly identical to its former Paparazzi incarnation, but additions like alligator-embossed tile, leather booths and blood red damask wallpaper play up the bordello vibe. The result is like going drinking in the middle of Lady Gaga's "Alejandro" video.

Adjacent to the bar, a tequila locker houses prized bottles, with certain labels jumping into triple digits for a single shot. Cocktails and margaritas emphasize fresh ingredients.

"We're resetting people's expectations," says Jamison. All guests are greeted with a smoking bowl of mint-grapefruit granita (spiked or virgin) and end their meal with green apple cotton candy and pop rocks.

Chef Brian Roche's menu lends an approachable twist to the brooding décor, with four kinds of guacamole (including one with lobster and lump crab), bubbling queso fundido dip ($11) and a spicy carne asada ($23). "It's dangerous and sexy," Jamison adds, "but it's still a neighborhood restaurant." That's good to hear, particularly knowing that when the word dangerous is used around Mexican food, it's usually referring to Montezuma's revenge.

Despite its Back Bay address and polished interior, Bacco's Wine + Cheese shop feels like a neighborhood bodega. This is partly on account of tastings held every afternoon except Sunday, but more because of owner Bob Bacco's superb array of affordable bottles and craft beers. Spanish ham, Iggy's bread and a masterful selection of European and domestic cheeses make the shop even more welcoming.

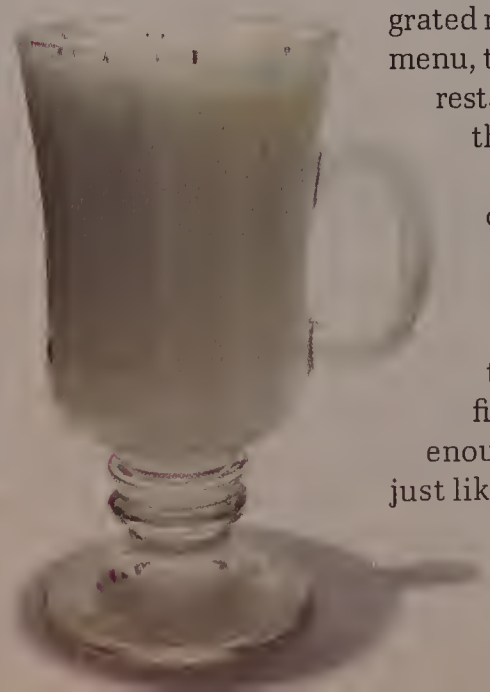
Drink of the Moment



Mother Knows Best

Michael "Fitzie" FitzPatrick, chief libations officer at Tremont 647, believes in seasonal ingredients. In his seven years tending bar, he's invented cocktails like the Eggnog from Hell and the Fallen Apple. This winter, he's concocted the MILK & HONEY ♦ ($9), which combines a Brandy Alexander with motherly wisdom. "When I was sick or couldn't sleep as a kid, my mom would make me warm milk with a bit of honey and a dash of vanilla extract," Fitzie explains. "This is a grownup spin."

He mixes 1 ½ ounces of Evan Williams Honey Reserve Bourbon with 1 ½ ounces white crème de cacao and tops it with steamed milk and grated nutmeg. As the only hot option on this season's menu, the frothy, sweet-leaning cocktail has become the restaurant's go-to digestif. Smooth and easy-drinking, the cocktail is a perfect relaxing nightcap.

The first sip is like nestling into a warm bed on a cold night, though the Tremont 647 bar is markedly more social. Notes of cacao and honey are subtle instead of candy-sweet, and the bourbon blends easily with the creaminess of the milk, leaving a silky finish that lingers long enough to tuck you in, just like mom used to.

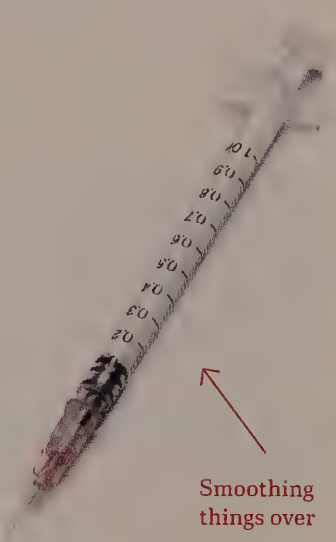
LIPSTICK ON A GUINEA PIG

A burning, scraping, stabbing journey through skincare

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

I DON'T GO TO GREAT LENGTHS TO improve my appearance. Shaving on consecutive days is something I did in my teens, back when the ritual was a novelty, not an annoying necessity. The hairbrush has only recently become part of my grooming arsenal. But I floss (almost) every night, so let's not start throwing stones.



A couple of weeks ago, I was flipping through the channels and landed on a show called Bridalplasty, a terrifying program in which young women compete for implants, nose jobs and other procedures in the hope that, on their wedding days, they'll be able to unveil themselves as completely unrecognizable to their husbands-to-be. The show came up in a conversation with a friend, who, it turns out, never misses an episode. A nurse practitioner specializing in skincare, she shared delightful stories about wealthy, Percocet-addled housewives and desperate boob-flashers soliciting illegal, direct injections of silicone. As the images swarmed in my imagination, the world of medical aesthetics became a canvas for Charlie and the Juvéderm Factory, or a painting by Hieronymus Bosch by way of Us Weekly. Seeing the fear in my eyes, she offered to guide me through some of the outer circles of beauty's inferno.

Preferring to remain anonymous, I'll refer to my friend as Joan, in honor of Rivers, the patron saint of aggressive measures. So it's fitting that the first thing she did when I arrived was sandblast my face. Technically a microdermabrasion, Joan exfoliated my features with a small plastic node attached to two tubes: one for sucking in my skin, the other for barraging the surface with aluminum oxide crystals. Aesthetics normally keep the suction power to around 35 kilopascals, but as a nurse, Joan was free to crank the dial to 48. The process sounds unpleasant, but it's relaxing, like being cleaned by a toothy vacuum.

The next logical step was to smear my face with acid—10 percent glycolic, to be exact. To me, the notion of a chemical peel has always brought to mind a Mission: Impossible-esque revelation, with the recipient literally peeling off a latex mask to reveal his true, debonair self. In reality, the person underneath looks like a guy who fell asleep on the beach, as, before it's neutralized, the acid evokes the feeling of a freshly smacked sunburn.

Then it was time for some real pain. After extracting the pores of my nose with a "scoop" and a "spear," Joan unholstered her laser gun for some hair removal on my throat. What followed was five minutes of penitence for every sinful ingrown hair, each exploding follicle snapping like a rubber band against my jugular. The smell of burning beard was disturbing, but what really had me nervous was the final step: Botox.

I'm more comfortable communicating with a smirk or a shrug than with actual verbalization, so I find my frown lines useful. Now with five shots of botulism between my eyebrows, my preferred method of expressing disdain has been paralyzed. "People are going to say 'Oh, Nick, you look so happy!'" Joan assured. That's not something I'm used to hearing.

Smoothing things over

"You look like you got beat up," said my father. It was Christmas morning, my neck was irritated, my forehead slightly swollen and ruddy cheeks were emerging from underneath a shedding layer of epidermis. My skincare session produced no holiday miracle, but as the days progressed, I found myself rounding into a smooth New Year's baby. But a mere $559 in procedures won't sway me from my austere grooming habits. I don't fit the type, do I?

"I have everyone from landscapers to pro athletes' wives," said Joan, correcting my assumptions. With an age range of 16 to 86, her customers' motives vary beyond the vanity stereotype. "There's people who got laid off and feel like they're competing in a younger job market, or people that just got divorced and maybe they're not feeling so good about themselves."

Like buying a new shirt, there's an element of pampering coupled with a moment of trying on a fresh persona, a fleeting version of you. But for now, I'll stick with my current method of revitalization: a winter beard, grown to shroud, and to be shaved on my birthday, revealing a newly exfoliated, inescapably older me. ✖✖✖

TO ANYONE WHO WEARS PAJAMAS OUTSIDE OF THE HOUSE:
It may have been cute when you were nine years old, but you're pushing 30 now and you look ridiculous. I know you like your comfy slippers and flannel bunny jammies, but come on! Were you really in that much of a rush to get your Grand Slam breakfast that you couldn't put on a pair of pants? Please do society a favor and brush your teeth, run a comb through your hair and get dressed.

The grim sleeper

To the irate driver in Alley #420:
Yes, I was driving the wrong way. After parking next to a brick wall and between four SUVs for the last three years, I've learned that entering the alley the wrong way is really the only option to properly maneuver into my spot. I gave you the right of way, but for some reason you couldn't let it go and blocked me in so you could snap a picture of my license plate. Good luck with that, buddy. Next time, try taking your righteous road rage out of my back yard.

Girl in the Saab

To the noisiest of neighbors:
I hear you having sex. I hear you on the phone. I hear you playing with the pipes (or whatever the hell you're doing when it sounds like metal is moving in the wall). I hear you sneeze. I even heard you yawn once. I could sing along with Glee when you're watching it and my TV is off. The floor isn't insulated and the walls are thin. I'm begging, please! Shut up!

TRACKED TEARS

An epistolary record of national grief

THE BOXES OF LETTERS delivered to the White House after JFK's assassination stretched out for a quarter-mile. This small, impassioned selection of those letters reveals an America that wore its heart on its sleeve. Many of them read as if they were intimate whisperings from Kennedy family friends, while admiration for JFK's presidential accomplishments (like the Peace Corps) were almost secondary to worship of his charisma.

The writers particularly identify with Jackie, flavoring their messages with weeping and religion. The most poignant come from the uneducated who stumble through misspellings: "This is the saddess day of my life" (sic). Pathos abounds. A child writes:

Letters to Jackie: Condolences From a Grieving Nation
by Ellen Fitzpatrick

Fitzpatrick is a history professor at the University of New Hampshire. She lives in Newton.

"Some mean man killed my dady too here in dallas. My dady was a soldrer. Sanda Clause di den get my letter." From one of Kennedy's own cohorts, a Choate graduate, "I literally worshiped the ground he walked on."

Others link their own loss to this tragedy; one man's father died upon hearing news of the killing. The handwriting is curly and cursive, sometimes tear-stained. These letters show how, on assassination day, the nation's heart cracked like an egg. ✖✖✖

"Something vital is missing from the house on 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. Maybe it is youthfulness, a lovely young couple, two charming children, or maybe a guiding hand, a gay wit, and a special security people drew from his presence, all these things and more, Americans lost when Lee Harvey Oswald committed his heinous crime.... Though he died, still his ideals were not and will not be buried. I promise you I will give body and soul to perpetuate the very ideals President Kennedy lived for." (Barbara Rimer, 15 years old)

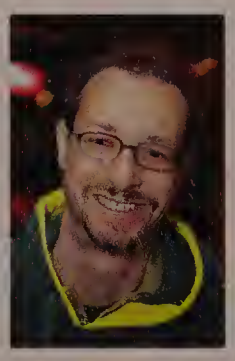
BACK TO BUSINESS

Darryl's Corner Bar serves memories of its former self.

TAKING ROOT Revisit the new incarnation of an old haunt with a "bowl o' beets" and a seat at the banquette.



THEY SAY CERTAIN restaurant spaces are cursed, with new tenants destined to fail no matter their concept. Darryl's Corner Bar seems to have another dilemma, as it will inevitably be compared to Bob's Southern Bistro (née Bob the Chef's)—same owner, same location, different times.

When I arrived at the Columbus Avenue spot to meet the Gallows' chef Seth Morrison, the tunes of a live jazz trio brought me back to Bob's, which had been succeeded by Circle, followed by the Stork Club. Historical impressions remain: round retro tiles trimming the bar are left over from Circle, while the menu is similar to the one put in place by the Stork Club.

Regardless of the past, we found Darryl's—named after owner Darryl Settles—in a celebratory mood. The music, a heated mix of jazz and reggae, cut through the frigid evening.

Morrison settled in with a Presidente beer ($5) and told me more about his family life. He grew up in Weston and was cooking by the age of eight. When it was time for college, he explained, "I wanted to go to culinary school, but it was the late '80s. People didn't do that yet."

He opted for a liberal arts education at Earlham College in Indiana and eventually made it into the kitchen at John Harvard's Brew House in Harvard Square. Later, he worked his way up to sous chef at East Coast Grill before bouncing around the Caribbean, then back to Boston where he helped open La Morra in Brookline.

We began our dinner with a couple of salads: the Caesar ($8), a crisp stack of romaine topped with four anchovy slivers, and the "big bowl o' beets" ($8), which came lightly warmed and flecked with parsley and the mild tang of Gorgonzola bits. (The kitchen withheld the pine nuts, per Morrison's request).

"I like that crispy crunch in the Caesar, and it's not too overdressed," he said. The fresh anchovies added a punch of briny salt, too.

The menu was familiar to Morrison, who once worked with Darryl's consulting chef, Tim Partridge, at the now-closed Perdix. (Partridge is no longer working with Darryl's.) It was during his Perdix stint that Morrison connected with his current Gallows partners, Rebecca Roth and Seth Yaffe.

"I had this amazing group of people to work with there," Morrison explains. "Seth was my sous chef. Rebecca had just finished culinary school. We developed a really tight-knit family."

Our second course, a trio of dishes, arrived just as the band was taking a set break. We tried a platter of beer-battered catfish fingers ($10) served with a relish-heavy remoulade. (Morrison prefers his with just a hit of lemon.) A side of collard greens ($5) came tinged with vinegar and, Morrison pointed out, touched with a bit too much butter. But it was the shrimp étouffée ($10) that clinched Darryl's position as a solid soul food joint. Smothered over a handful of hearty shrimp and a mound of white rice, it had a healthy kick of pepper.

"This is done really well," assessed Morrison, scooping up the last bite. "It's got the right amount of heat. The shrimp are cooked well. All the elements you need."

We ended the meal with a three-layered slab of red velvet cake ($7), the one dessert Morrison couldn't resist. "I'm not really into sweets," he said. "But I do like red velvet cake, and this one's pretty good."

We ended our night as the band finished their set but noticed couples around us lingering over drinks. "I enjoyed it," Morrison said as we bundled up against the cold. "And it looks like they've already found their crowd." ✖✖✖

STEPPING UP

The Steppingstone Foundation, founded to prepare urban youth for postsecondary education success, celebrated its 20th anniversary on Nov. 3 at the Charles Hotel. More than 300 people attended the event, including young alumni of Steppingstone programs. The event raised $670,000.

Some 800 people flocked to Chestnut Hill's Atrium Mall and the AMC theater on Dec. 5 for the 26th annual "Joey O'Donnell Film Premiere." Guests enjoyed a supper party and screening of The King's Speech. The event raised $850,000 for the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

HARD SELL

Ezra invents Take Your Husband to Work Day.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

HOW MANY OF US KNOW what our significant others do at work? You may have an idea, generally, of what they do, but I'll wager that few us have much understanding of the day-to-day lives of our girlfriends or boyfriends, husbands or wives. For instance, I know that my wife, Heather, sells cosmetic lasers, that her territory is New England and that one of her company's products resembles the robot from the movie Short Circuit. Beyond that, I don't really know what she does, which is why I propose Take Your Husband to Work Day. To my surprise, she agrees. Which proves she's either exceptionally forgiving or has a short memory, since the last time I entered her workplace I was dressed as a giant bean and gave her a lap dance.

On the morning of Take Me to Work Day, I arise early and begin getting dressed. Heather eyes my jeans and says, "No, you've got to wear business clothes. You're taking this seriously." I thought I was taking this seriously. I mean, I'm wearing pants.

We get in the car and plot our plan to sell the hell out of some lasers. We're heading to Rhode Island to hit a few doctors' offices, maybe a medspa or two, and spread the gospel about lasering your way to aesthetic perfection. I'm ready to deal.

"You're not coming in," Heather tells me when we arrive at the first doctor's office. "Maybe you can come in on a later one. Here, I'll park the car so the sun's not in your face." I sort of get the feeling that I'm considered a liability. Experience has made me well-attuned to that sentiment.

A few minutes later, Heather returns with a brochure—from a competing company that beat us to our target. The brochure features before and after photos of a woman's thong-clad buttocks, which, quite honestly, look pretty good to me even in the "before" photo. "I know you're not going to want to hear this," I tell Heather, "but that company has better asses. Their 'before' is better than your 'after.'"

"That's not the point," Heather replies. "The idea is to show a big change, so you want to start with a worse one." I disagree. People don't want to look at gross butts when you're trying to sell them something. If I were in charge around here, the brochure butts would go from nice to nicer. That's what sells lasers, I tell you.

We get back on the road. At the next stop, Heather tells me to come with her. "What am I going to do?" I ask. She tells me to just stand behind her and keep my mouth shut. "Managers come along all the time, and they usually just observe," she says. As we walk in, I try to assume a managerial demeanor. Which is slightly difficult, since I'm acutely aware that I have three stitches in my neck from a recent dermatological adventure. I feel less like a salesman than a goon, the muscle of this operation. "Hey, you wanna buy this here laser, or what? I think it'd be in your best interest to do business with us, 'cause it'd be a shame if you went with another company and then came to have… regrets."

As Heather chats with the receptionist, I hang back and try not look like Menacing Mr. Stitchneck. Heather asks to see the doctor, the receptionist politely shuts her down, and we're on our way. "That's how it usually goes with a cold call," Heather says as we walk to the car. This whole cold-call concept seems to leave room for improvement. Here's my innovation: calling ahead.

We hit a couple more spots and then take a lunch break at Panera Bread. In the parking lot, Heather points out a man and a woman in a car facing us. They're wearing business attire, and one of them has a laptop open. "I guarantee that's a rep and a manager doing a ride-along," Heather says. It occurs to me that they probably assume the same about us. "Let's make out," I say. "That'll freak them out." I go in for a kiss, but the latent static electricity in my head-to-toe wool causes me to lip-taze her, and both of us recoil sharply from the shock. Now the people in the other car are indeed looking at us in confusion—from their perspective, they just saw two co-workers about to lock lips before a lightning bolt shot out of their faces. You hang around a Panera parking lot long enough, you see some things.

At the end of the day, we've covered 146 miles, and I haven't helped close any deals. Now that I know more about Heather's job, though, I have an idea of how I might assist. But I need to hit the gym for a few months first if we're going to improve those butt photos. ✖✖✖

The Collins Card { CHRIS COLLINS }

NEVER ANY DOUBT

Belichick has the Pats back on top.

I QUESTIONED HIM. I questioned his personnel choices. I thought he was starting to lose his mind. (Remember last year's infamous 4th-and-2 call against the Colts?) I thought maybe one of football's greatest geniuses had lost his mental dexterity.

I was wrong. So I want to apologize to New England Patriots CEO Bill Belichick.

At this moment, I'm more impressed with Belichick and his revamped squad than at any point during their reign as the "Team of the Decade." The Patriots are back in their post as Super Bowl favorites, and I should've seen it coming.

Before the season, I took my annual guys-trip out to Las Vegas. I remember staring at the endless streams of numbers on the huge sports-book screens and looking for value. Knowing full well they don't just give money away, I kept telling myself not to be sucked in by a bet that looks too good to be true.

One number stuck out: 9 ½. It was the over/under for total wins by the 2010 Patriots.

As they buried the Chicago Bears, 36-7, in Week 14, during a steady snowstorm, the Patriots had already earned 10 wins. In other words, Chicken Little, aka Chris Collins, didn't have the guts to make a fortune.

Even more impressive than scaling the "over" was the team's performance against the AFC's strongest competition, including wins over the Baltimore Ravens, San Diego Chargers, Pittsburgh Steelers and New York Jets, not to mention the victory over the Bears, at the time the number-two seed in the NFC.

The Pats' over/under number this season was the lowest since they won the Super Bowl in 2001, which means most people doubted the team and its coach.

There was good reason. The Patriots defense was full of no-namers and no-gamers. There wasn't a proven guy on that side of the ball apart from Vince Wilfork. They were either too young to have made a reputation or hadn't been able to crack another team's roster.

> The Patriots are back in their post as Super Bowl favorites, and I should've seen it coming.

We were told they just needed time, but we'd heard that before. One thing I'd forgotten was that Belichick took over as the team's defensive coordinator. I figured the added responsibility would be too much work. Again, I was wrong.

The role gave Belichick the opportunity to be in the classroom every day with these "kids." His tutelage has galvanized a unit that struggled early in the year.

As for Brady, well, I never doubted him. I just didn't think he had enough talent around him to have another MVP season. Wrong again. In fact, Brady has never played with more emotion and has proven to be the clear leader of the team now that all of the Tedy Bruschi Era guys are gone.

But as good a season as Brady has had in 2010, the most crucial cog in the system has been the coach. Look at Belichick's history. If he can derive a defense to stop "The Greatest Show on Turf" in Super Bowl XXXVI, or, during his time with the Giants, defeat the Bills' infamous "K-Gun" offense in Super Bowl XXVI, then it'll be easy pickings taking down the best his opponents have to offer in the 2010 playoffs.

Sure, Belichick hasn't been perfect. He's missed on a few draft picks. He's signed a few free-agent clunkers. But his ability to adjust to these mistakes, almost without missing a beat, is unparalleled.

I've learned my lesson. When it comes to Belichick and the Patriots, always bet the over. Trust me, in the end, the odds will be in your favor. ×××

ON BECKETT, RONDO AND FAVRE

A BIG HELP Nate Robinson

5 NEW YEAR'S RESOLUTIONS

Josh Beckett: Whatever resolutions you made for 2007
Get back on the same workout. Eat the same diet. Listen to the same music. (Hinder, anyone?) Hunt with the same rifle! Whatever you did, do it again. That's the mindset Beckett needs, and that's the Beckett the Sox need. Because lost in all the awesomeness of their recent acquisitions is the fact that without Beckett and John Lackey returning to form, there still may be problems afoot. (Nah, I'll save the Rex Ryan jokes for later.)

Rajon Rondo: Make it to April
And that means scaling it back a little in January, February and even March. You love how badly Rondo wants to play, but for the first two months of the season, he was getting beat down at a rate only matched by his insane assist totals. Nate Robinson can help this team a lot—but not if he's starting in April.

Brandon Meriweather: Be nicer to the Pro Bowl voters
Or do something special for Pro Bowl voters. Or maybe, ooh, this is good... do something on the field to justify your improbable selection to the 2011 Pro Bowl. On one hand, it's not like Meriweather has been horrendous, but it's time for him to be "not horrendous" with a little more consistency. At least that's according to the Big Bang Clock.

The Bruins: Don't look back
As I write, the B's have just jumped into first place in the Northeast Division, which is hard to believe considering all the negative energy that's surrounded the team of late. For now, it looks like they've overcome their demons, but this wouldn't be the first time we were premature in anointing them an improved team. This time around, they've got to make it last.

Matt Millen: Go away
If there's one thing I won't miss about the end of Monday Night Football, it's the presence of mumbling Matt Millen trying to make sense out of something. It's hard to imagine that he could be worse on TV than he was in the Lions front office, but with Millen, nothing is impossible. So, Matt, take a timeout this winter and learn from another Double M: Mike Mayock. Undisputed best in the business.

1 ONE CAREER OBITUARY

Brett Favre (1991-2010). His career died doing what it loved most—tormenting the hell out of honest, football-loving Americans. It leaves a tarnished legacy of big-time interceptions and small-sized wang photos, and will be missed by no one. In lieu of flowers, send hate mail to PO Box 4, Hattiesburg, MS 39401.

2 UNCONFIRMED NFL HEAD COACH FETISHES

Good, you've pinpointed it. Step two is washing it out. Looking for Andy Reid at halftime? He won't be giving the Eagles an inspirational pep talk. Instead, he'll be locked in his office, bathing in a sea of magazine cologne samples. Reid has admitted that the manufactured scents give him an unspeakable rush... and the motivation to screw up even the simplest two-minute drill.

Hot to Trot Some guys need a blue pill to get them in the mood. Others just need a pair of pretty feet. But former 49ers coach Mike Singletary? All he needs are the dulcet tones of a one Bobcat Goldthwait. It's not something Singletary's proud of, but word out of San Francisco is that his Goldthwait obsession had begun to drastically affect his focus and may have played a large role in the coach's dismissal. Argghh!!

3 Biggest Threats to the AFC Crown (IN REVERSE ORDER)

WIN IT! A ring beckons

3. STEELERS/JETS: I'll let the two sexual misfits Big Ben and Sexy Rexy share this section, but only because neither is deserving by himself. The Steelers offensive line is in shambles, and their history against the Pats doesn't help their confidence. Meanwhile, Rex won't leave Foxborough a winner unless he steals a bag of used socks from the locker room.

2. COLTS: I don't care how many "starters" are injured. As long as Peyton Manning, Dwight Freeney and Robert Mathis are in uniform, the Colts are a serious threat. Still, they're a lot easier to deal with when flanked by a crew of teammates better suited for the Bills.

1. RAVENS: Maybe the memory of last season is still too heavy on the brain, or maybe the threat of Ray Rice and Anquan Boldin on offense, combined with the game-changing ability of Ed Reed, Ray Lewis and Terrell Suggs on defense, makes me uneasy. Or maybe (OK, probably) I'm just trying to convince myself that the Pats won't be able to cruise right into Dallas. It can't be that easy, right?

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/5: The Baseball Hall of Fame announces its Class of 2011. And if Phil Plantier doesn't finally get his due, there is no God.

1/10: The BCS National Championship finally kicks off in Arizona. Keep an eye out for The Improper's new tattoos-for-trade parlor, coming to a Glendale parking lot near you.

1/15-16: It's the NFL Divisional Playoffs. Whether the Pats play on Saturday or Sunday is still TBD, but just start the tailgating on Friday night either way.

1/17: The Celtics host the Magic and look to get even for the Christmas Day disaster. By the way, as you were reading this, Shaq fouled out.

Soroff On PADMA LAKSHMI

The cooking show host and supermodel chats about her fitness regimen, chocolate soup and seduction dishes.

PADMA LAKSHMI, 40, HOST OF BRAVO'S Emmy Award–winning Top Chef, was raised in India, New York and California before earning a degree in theater arts from Clark University in Worcester. She won international fame as the first Indian supermodel and acted in film and television, but established herself as a culinary expert by hosting three food programs and writing the best-selling cookbook Easy Exotic, followed by Tangy, Tart, Hot and Sweet. She has anchored shows for the Food Network and recently finished her sixth season as host of Top Chef. Briefly married to author Salman Rushdie, she has her own line of culinary products, Easy Exotic, as well as jewelry, the Padma Collection, which is sold by retailers like Bergdorf Goodman. A cofounder of the Endometriosis Foundation of America, she has also written for magazines like Vogue, Harper's Bazaar and Gourmet. She lives in New York with her daughter.

Jonathan Soroff: Your career has so many odd hyphenates. How do you describe yourself?
Padma Lakshmi: Tired.

Where do you get the energy?
I must've slept in a previous life.

How do you stay so thin?
I run up and down stairs all day long: I do 70 flights a day in my stairwell. I carry a jump-rope in my suitcase and I use it. I've been boxing for 10 years. I just exercise as often as I can.

Favorite cuisine?
Anything somebody else cooks. [Laughs.] One thing that happens when you write cookbooks is that friends think they're a menu, and they say, "I want to come over and have..." So I like when other people cook for me.

If I were to show up at your house unexpectedly, what would you make me to eat?
Probably a grilled-cheese sandwich.

If you had to give up all but one of your careers, which would it be?
I'd probably keep my job as a writer.

What should home cooks leave to professionals?
Desserts. I find there are usually cooks and then there are bakers. Baking is an exact science.

Do you have a favorite cooking shortcut?
Like a restaurant, I do my mise en place ahead of time. I keep the staples in my cooking pre-chopped in my fridge, in containers.

Which cuisine is easiest to master?
Italian food is very approachable. I wouldn't say it's easy to master, but it's easy to familiarize yourself with it. To truly master any kind of cuisine you have to live with it, and that takes time.

Is there one food you can't go without eating?
I'm Asian, so if I don't have rice or noodles for a week, I'm pretty much jonesing for it.

Worst part of modeling?
If the phone rings, you've got to grab your passport and your bag and just go, so I wound up canceling plans with friends and family a lot. The lack of a home life is very difficult.

Best part?
The travel and the money. In that order.

Defining characteristic of a good cookbook?
A mix of more advanced, difficult or sophisticated recipes and some easy, simple and quick ones. Like your diet, it should be balanced and varied.

Favorite spice?
My single favorite spice is the dried red chili.

Describe your life as a recipe or dish.
I think the last recipe in my book, which is one of my favorites, is what I call the WD-40 of the kitchen. It's chili-honey butter. It's got a lot of fat. It's very sweet. And very spicy.

Kitchen implement you can't live without?
My wooden spoon.

Most unconventional use you've ever made of a kitchen tool?
[Laughs.] Sorry, that's private.

Do you have a seduction dish?
Yeah. [Laughs.]

But I'm not likely to find out what it is?
No. I can't give away all my secrets. I have to save some for my next book.

Is there a silver bullet in the kitchen?
You can always turn anything into a soup. I was once cooking a big dinner, and Vanity Fair was covering it. I was supposed to make chocolate ice cream but the ice cream maker was not working, so I just made chilled chocolate soup. No one knew the difference.

So is my homegirl Tiffani Faison [chef at Rocca] going to win on Top Chef All-Stars*?*
Watch what happens.

Favorite chef or restaurant?
My favorite restaurant, just because it feels like home, is Indochine in New York.

Favorite fashion designer of the moment?
I'm wearing a lot of Antonio Berardi.

What will I always find in your refrigerator?
A whole bunch of different hot sauces, from the very pedestrian Sriracha or Tapatío to more exotic sauces. There's also a lot of cheeses. A lot of bottles of Champagne. And lots of leaves: bay leaves, kaffir lime leaves, basil, cilantro, mint.

What characteristic unifies all the different disciplines you've pursued?
I'm interested in producing work or things that bring people pleasure, whether it's something to eat, a piece of jewelry, a book.

Grossest thing you ever ate?
[Laughs.] A chocolate ganache with a piece of liver embedded in it, made by [season two Top Chef–winner] Ilan Hall.

Fantasy guest list for a dinner party?
Oh, fun! OK, I would like to cook for Muhammad Ali, Marilyn Monroe, Toulouse-Lautrec, Confucius, Einstein and Cleopatra. But I'd also invite my mom and daughter to share the experience.

Is the way to a man's heart really through his stomach?
Yes, and a couple of other places. [Laughs.] ✖✖✖

Crunch Time

BY AMANDA KNORR

I'm not a gym person. I'll spend some time on the elliptical, giving its digital clock death stares, but once I'm sick of the songs on my iPod, every shred of remaining willpower vanishes. I want to be fit and healthy, but routine exercise bores the crap out of me. To jumpstart my New Year's resolution, I attended five classes at five different gyms, hoping to find my niche and a new appreciation for athleticism.

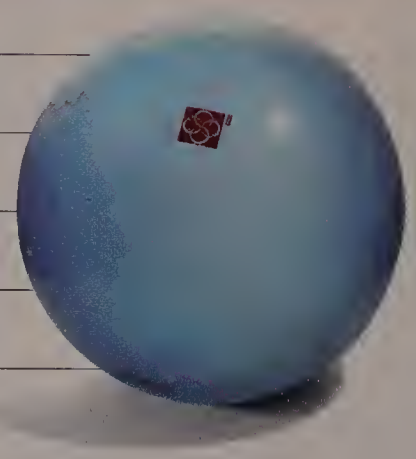
BOSU CONDITIONING



BODYSCAPES

1285 Beacon St., Brookline

(617-232-1010) bodyscapesfitness.com

TRAINER: Elaine Murphy

TIME: Tue., 7:30-8:30 pm

IF YOU'RE familiar with the typical fitness ball, picture that, but with a sand-filled bottom. Weighing a little more than five pounds (almost half of which is sand), the BOSU Ballast ball is difficult to stabilize when in motion, but keeps still once you put it down. Sessions focus on dynamic drills with the ball, including lunges, squats and sit-ups.

"The class will introduce you to exercises you've never done before," says trainer Mike Anderson. "It's a great way to spice up your routine." Since group instructor Elaine Murphy is out, Anderson shows me the drills, usually conducted in a circuit.

I'm more concerned with face-planting.

We perform "super sets," or repeating series of quick exercises designed to target different muscle groups. During the chops, I swing the ball from above one shoulder, across my body to the opposite hip, bringing it to an abrupt stop, working my arms, upper back and shoulders. As I attempt to perform a rollout (with knees on the ground and hands on the ball, extending my upper body flat while keeping my core tight), Anderson poses a question:

Anderson: "Do you have a sister?"

Me: "No."

Anderson: "Brother?"

Me: "Yes."

Anderson: "Did he ever punch you in the stomach?"

Me: "Uh...no."

Anderson: "Okay, well you want to make the same muscle right now that you'd make if someone were about to hit you in the stomach."

I'm more concerned with face-planting, but to my surprise, it never happens. The sand makes these lightweight balls deceptively sturdy, providing necessary resistance for strengthening routines. +

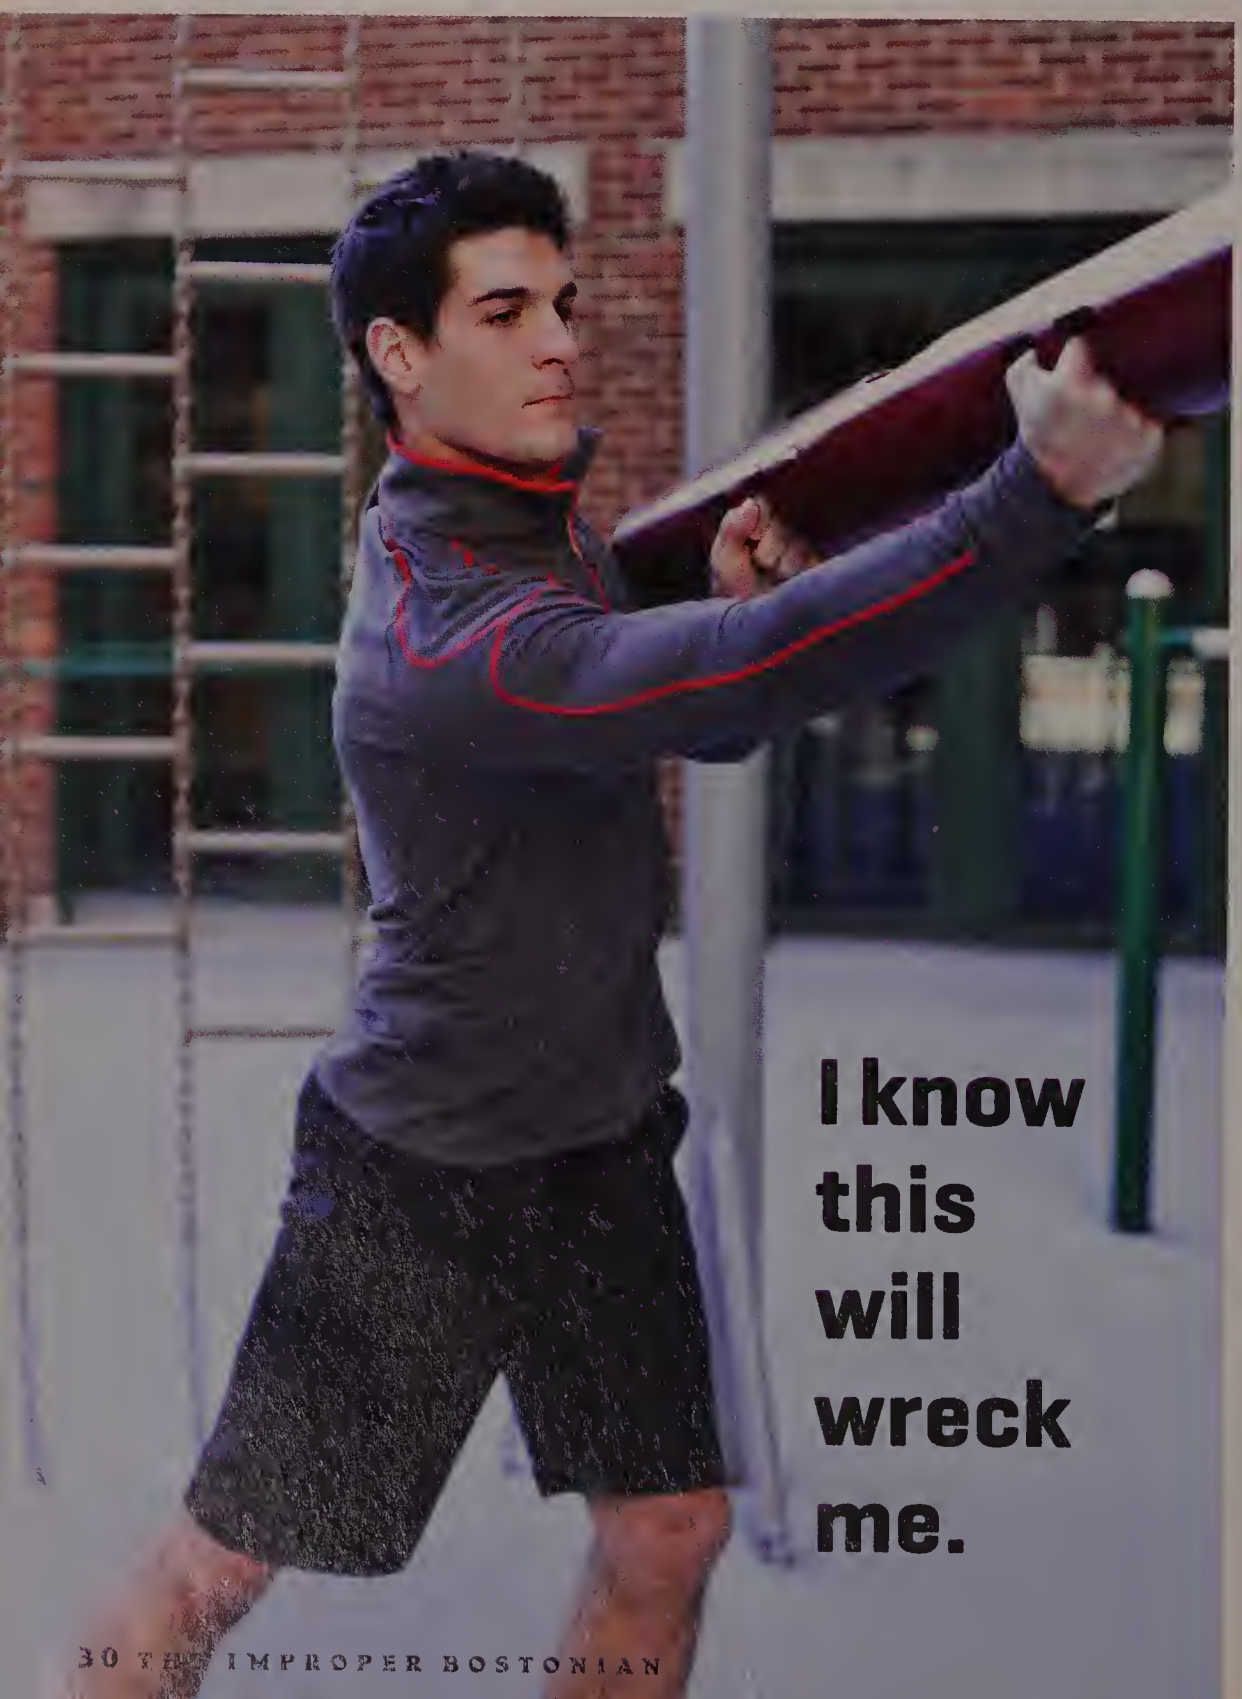
CHOP SHOP

A BALANCED WORKOUT WITH AN UNEVEN WEIGHT

BEYOND STRENGTH

EQUINOX

225 Franklin St., Boston



(617-426-2140) equinox.com

TRAINER: Bryan Sobolewski

TIME: Tue., 5:30-6:15 pm

EQUINOX IS often at the forefront of exercise trends, so I'm excited to test out the ViPR (which stands for vitality, performance and reconditioning). Pronounced "viper," this hollow rubber log (replete with handles) was developed by movement specialist, author and trainer Michol Dalcourt. Equinox just introduced the ViPR for individual sessions, and they're used in the Beyond Strength class.

Before my workout, I watch a promo video featuring a bunch of super-fit athletes sweating like crazy, so I know this will wreck me. Probably aware of this, trainer Stefan Jacobs starts me off with a lighter weight (they range from 4-20 kg) in an individual session.

"It's meant to complement other tools at the gym, not replace them," Jacobs explains. "You can flip them, rotate them, pivot them... they're virtually indestructible. They're great for the acceleration and deceleration that you don't get from machines."

We go through a variety of motions with the ViPR, from uppercut punches to skates, working my arms, legs and core simultaneously. The only motion that comes naturally (from parking my car on the street in the winter) is the shoveling move: I start in a squat position with the ViPR low, then I use my quads, glutes, obliques, lats and biceps to control the swing as I follow through over the opposite shoulder.

BOD ROO

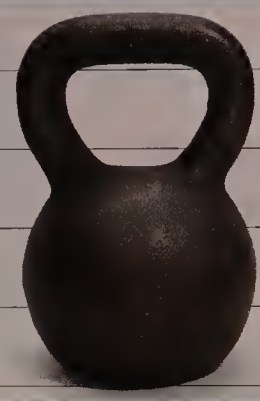
BECOME A PILLAR OF POWER

The ViPR wakes up all of your muscle groups, rather than just one, because of the balance and core strength required to keep it in control.

"If you have limited time at the gym, it's a great tool to work your entire body," adds Jacobs.

Another perk? If you drop it, the whole gym won't stop and stare. "You can use them in any open space. It's not a delicate piece of equipment—it's meant to hit the ground." +

PIT TRAINING



REVOLUTION FITNESS

209 Columbus Ave., Boston

(617-536-3006) revfitboston.com

TRAINER: Brendan McKee

TIMES: Tue. and Thu., 6:30 am and 6:30 pm

I ARRIVE FOR Group Dynamics Training in "the Pit" at 6:10 am, hoping I'll get to flop into a pool filled with padded foam or colored balls. Not the case. This six-week course actually takes place in Revolution's "pit room"—a garage-like area, complete with an up-and-over door, and filled with free weights, boxes, ropes and kettle bells. The space may sound intimidating, but the isolation is ideal for rocking out to loud music and keeping your attention in check. Instructor Brendan McKee keeps classes comfortably small with an eight-person max. My class has four. "I'm a coach and a trainer, so I don't like to instruct more [people] than that because I'm a stickler for form," says McKee.

Each hour-long class begins with a 15-20 minute warm-up involving jumps, lunges and inchworms from one side of the room to the other. Says McKee, "You never see Tom Brady going to a game cold because his risk of an injury would skyrocket. You should always be warm going into it."

The class includes esoteric aerobic exercises like Tabata, a type of high-intensity interval training developed by Japanese strength coach Izumi Tabata, and techniques like "periodization," which builds stability and "maximum-effort strength" over the duration of the course. Attendees work at one station for 30 seconds, rest for 10 seconds, then move to the next station. Routines, both aerobic and anaerobic, vary from class to class—ours include rope climbing, barbell step-ups, reverse lunges with weights and kettle bell lifts, scaled according to our levels of fitness.

The quick-paced class is fun and invigorating, and it keeps me in high spirits for the duration. +

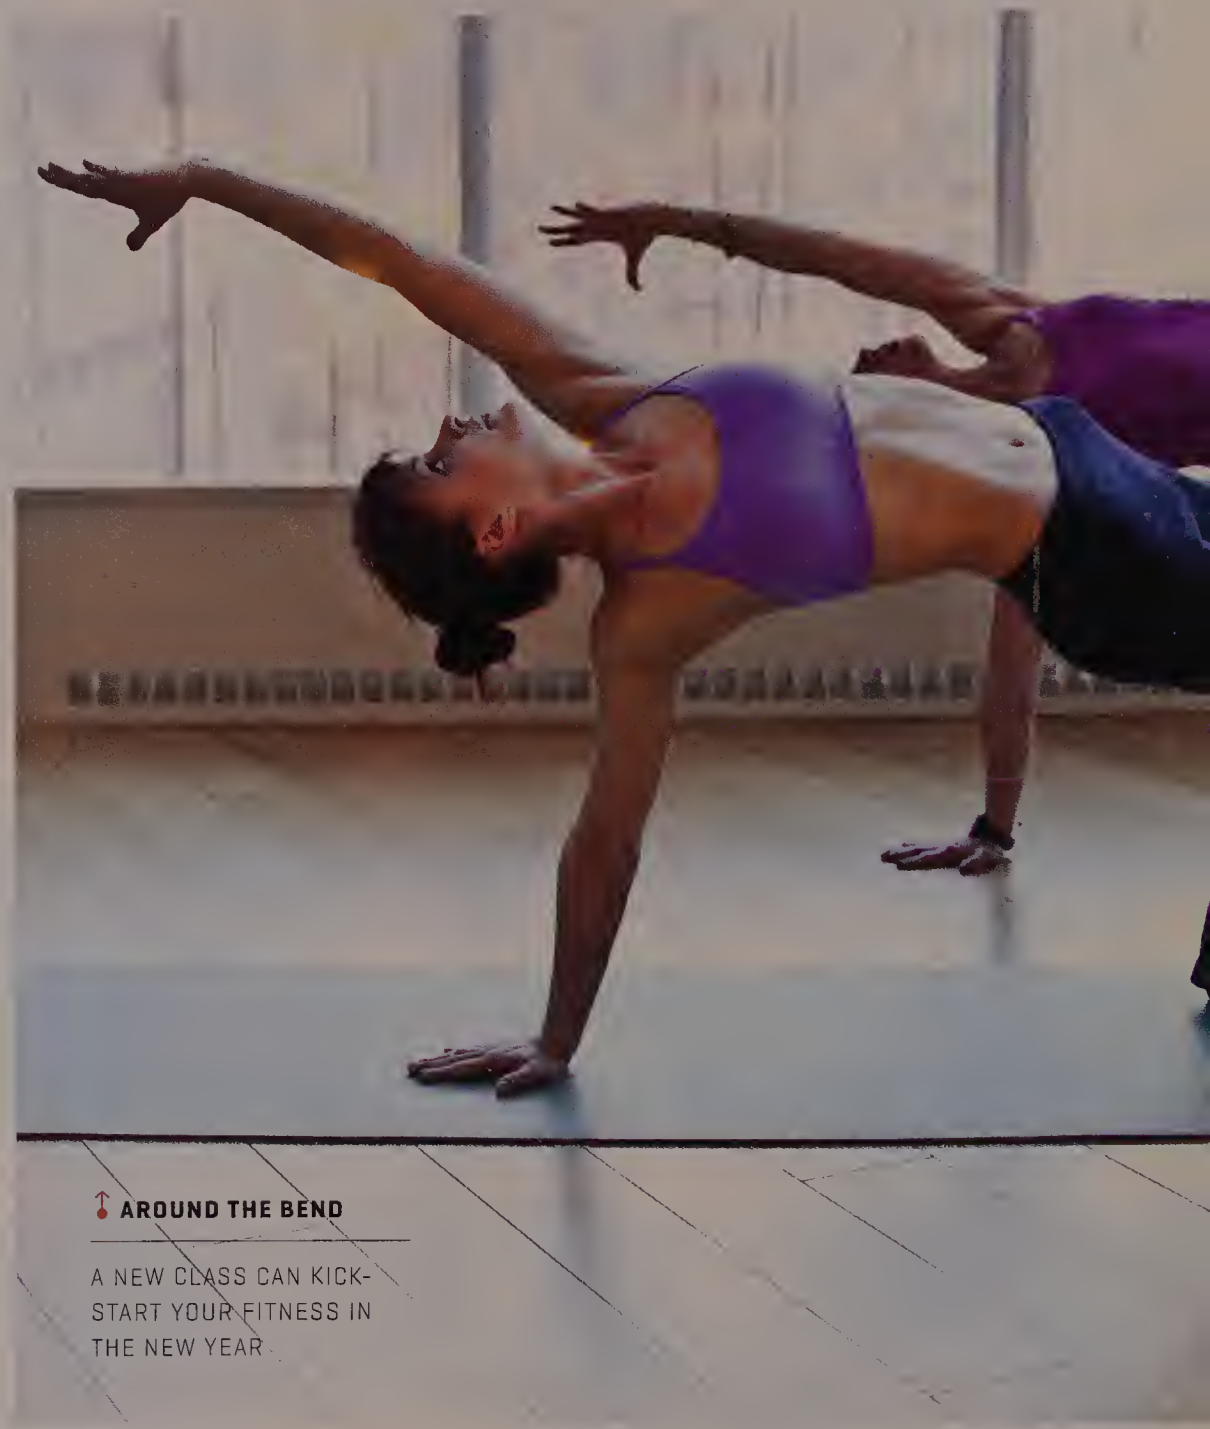
TRAINER: Brett Ferguson

TIMES: Mon., 12 and 5:30 pm; Wed., 12 and 6:30 pm; Fri., 12 pm

SUSPENDED DISBELIEF

STRAP UP AND WORK YOUR STABILIZING MUSCLES

IF YOU GOOGLE "TRX Suspension Training" you'll see something that looks like a cross between Cirque du Soleil and Olympic gymnastics. As many as eight TRX apparatuses hang from a secured bar at BSC, each of them composed of two handles connected by an adjustable strap.



"People are very teachable on it," assures trainer Brett Ferguson. "It can be for people who need smoother movements for their joints or for people who are very athletic and looking to do more advanced movements." I'm just looking to survive.

Happy to have my preconceived notions and dangling fears shut down, I discover that you remain grounded while using the TRX. It's designed for bodyweight exercises, and the more vertical you remain, the easier the movements.

For my upper body, Ferguson has me practice rear deltoid flys, tricep extensions and push-ups, all in an upright position. For my lower body, both straps go around one foot as I attempt the "TRX lunge" and one-legged squats. Last, and most difficult, are core exercises. With my feet in the straps and arms locked in push-up stance, I alternate my body between plank and pike positions.

I'm wowed by these unconventional takes on traditional exercises. Unlike with machines or free weights, the TRX feels like it's developing my balance as I work out. The system's versatility is especially impressive considering its simplicity—the days of the bulky Bowflex are, indeed, over.

AROUND THE BEND

A NEW CLASS CAN KICK-START YOUR FITNESS IN THE NEW YEAR

MARYANNE BLAKE, the instructor and creator of Zenergy, fuses two popular exercise styles in her new yoga-meets-aerobics workout. The idea came to Blake when she realized that members working out on the gym's second floor (mind/body) rarely made their way to the fourth floor (treadmills and weights), and vice versa.

"I wanted to open people's minds to how pose is related to movement and movement to athleticism," she says. A triathlete herself, Blake explains that yoga was her go-to recovery activity.

It's easy to spot a treadmill-junkie versus a yogi.

As it happens, this class arrives just as I'm feeling particularly sore from a prior workout. Hoping to remain inconspicuous at the well-attended session, I grab a floor mat and secure a quiet corner by a large beam in the back of the room. We start out with some basic yoga poses, which provide my body with a much-needed stretch. Transitions into the quick aerobic spurts (like running-in-place and jumping) are seamless, and somehow keep my mind off my lingering pain.

"A 'chair pose' in yoga uses the same muscle groups as a squat, and the 'warrior pose' works the same muscles as a lunge," explains Blake. "I think of the class as movement-based, with the principles of yoga."

Looking around the studio, it's easy to spot a treadmill-junkie versus a yogi (one's strength being the other's weakness), a testament to Blake's intuition. And to the broad appeal of her new approach. +

Borne Identity
Jonathan and his father,
Barry Solomon Soroff

Our man goes digging for roots.

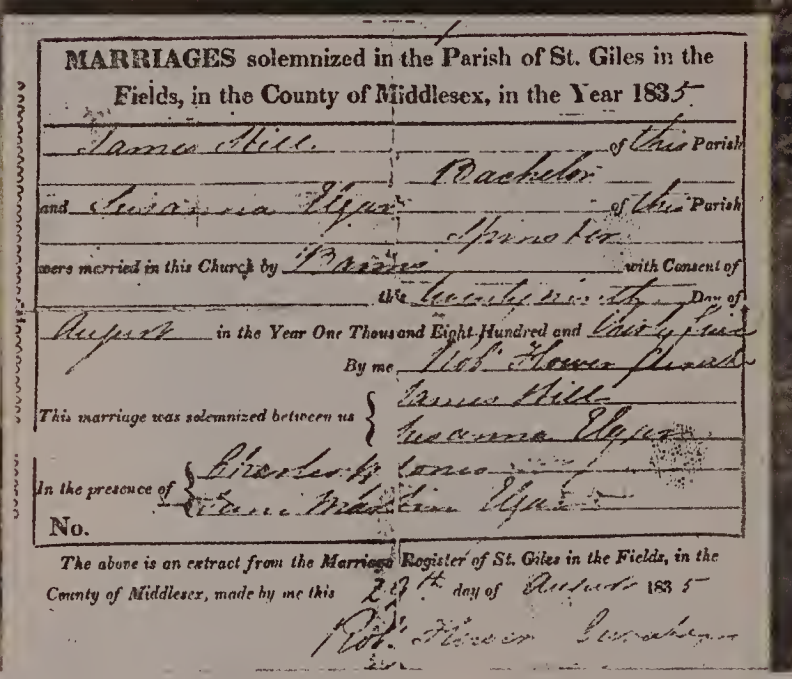
By Jonathan Soroff

REMEMBER THAT CHILDREN'S BOOK Are You My Mother? The image of the little bird questioning a steam shovel is permanently etched in my mind, and the story was likely one of my favorites because I was sure who my mother was. Same goes for my father. I was even lucky enough to know all four of my grandparents, three of whom lived well into their 90s, and one until 103. Beyond them, what I knew about my ancestors was mostly gleaned by piecing together fragments of conversation overheard during holidays or from the romantic, Scotch-fueled reminiscences of relatives. Looking back past the third generation, I was no different than the baby bird.



Mapping one's genealogy has never been easier, thanks in large part to the availability of DNA testing and nearly countless websites offering free access to family trees, including the Mormon church's staggering collection, one of the world's largest. (For anyone who wants to criticize them for the motive behind assembling their database—namely to posthumously baptize everyone who ever lived—I'll argue that it's a magnanimous gesture; the deceased can either accept or decline the offer.) And with the success of TV shows like Who Do You Think You Are? (where the family trees of celebrities like Sarah Jessica Parker and Spike Lee are delineated), along with the work of scholars like Skip Gates (who's applied genetics to African American history), the heirs of Roots author Alex Haley aren't the only ones making money off of tracing ancestry. So you'd think it would be a snap.

I attempted to find out. What I knew was that my father is Jewish, of Russian descent, and my mother was born and raised in New York and was English/Scottish by way of Canada. What I'd heard was that, on my father's side, there were some distinguished 19th-century rabbis and Talmudic scholars, and on my mother's, I was a relation of the English composer Sir Edward Elgar, the 1930s movie star Norma Shearer and the Canadian railroad baron James Jerome Hill. What I hoped was that I was somehow related to Elvis or Mr. T. The truth, I discovered, is both more prosaic and more interesting. ☞

YOU'VE PROBABLY passed it countless times walking down Newbury Street: the unassuming but stately gray building on the corner of Clarendon that houses the New England Historic Genealogical Society. If you've ever noticed it at all, you've probably dismissed it as a time capsule of official bric-a-brac from the Mayflower, or an ossuary for those crusty Boston families who fuss so ostentatiously over their lineage. At least, that's what I assumed. I wasn't aware that the NEHGS shares the building with the New England Chapter of the American Jewish Historical Society, as well as with some of the most extensive vital records—probate, wills, guardianships—covering not only New England, but all of America. They helped unravel the family history of princess-to-be Kate Middleton, established that Ellen DeGeneres is related to Madonna through a circular chain of celebrities that includes Halle Berry, Princess Diana and Mark Wahlberg, and determined that President Obama and Senator Scott Brown are 10th cousins—as are Ben Affleck and Matt Damon (once removed). In short, NEHGS researchers are some of the most experienced, resourceful and dogged in their field. Clearly, a good place to start.

On my first visit, I took a mail-order DNA test, available to the public for fees ranging anywhere from $100 to $700. The process simply involves scraping cells from the inside of the cheek (a buccal swab). After shipping the samples off to the lab, it was time to retrace my origins the old-fashioned way—by assembling a family tree.

For someone like me, whose forebears rapidly dissolve into vaguely transliterated names or foggy approximations, the first step was to fill in as many blanks as possible on a five-generation chart. These are available for free at NEHGS, but in my case, I was fortunate to be handed one by Rhonda McClure, their director of research services. A career genealogist, she can ferret out the most obscure familial connection. She would become my personal private eye, indefatigable and relentless, helping me to navigate a minefield of speculation and half-recalled facts. Starting with myself, I filled in the blanks, listing my parents, their parents, their parents and their parents. Ideally, I would have had 16 names in the last column. I only had six.

On my father's side, because of his Russian ancestry, the names petered out quickly. My grandmother claimed to remember hiding in a cellar while the Cossacks rounded up the Jews during the last pogrom in Kishinev in 1903 (when, one imagines, official record-keeping for the Czar's Hebrew subjects wasn't a major priority). She and my grandfather left Russia in a hurry around 1921 and went first to Canada, where my father was born, and then settled in Philadelphia. What remained of my father's family (his father's half-siblings and some cousins) reconnected after World War II, but most of the older names were lost in the dusty mess of 20th-century Eastern Europe. Another roadblock, not surprisingly, was the fact that Cyrillic and/or Hebrew names had to be approximated with the English alphabet. On the upside: Both my grandparents had social security numbers, which meant further clues might exist. But requesting the records involves dealing with U.S. government red tape, which for the purposes of researching this article, is akin to asking glaciers to break into a sprint.

Nevertheless, McClure unearthed something especially poignant for me. As a child, my grandmother would repeatedly tell me that she "used to love to dance," and that the captain of the Queen Mary had enjoyed twirling her around the parquet. I found this impossible to believe, coming from a woman with crepe-paper skin waving a palsied index finger in my face. McClure, however, located the official immigration entries that showed my grandmother had, in fact, sailed on the Queen Mary on three separate occasions. It was just a few jottings in a bureaucratic ledger, but it brought the memory of my grandmother rushing back to me with a visceral, Proustian force.

On my mother's side, I was a bit more fortunate in that I knew the names of her maternal great-grandparents. Yet what I'd heard and what McClure could unearth didn't seem to jibe. My maternal grandmother's maiden name was Hill, and she was from Canada. I mentioned that there were supposed connections to the railroad baron James Jerome Hill and to Sir Edward Elgar, the English composer whose "Pomp and Circumstance" is the wedding march of commencement ceremonies. My grandmother referred to at least one male relative as "cousin Elgar," and as a child, I was taken to see his memorial at Westminster Abbey. Going on what I'd given her, though, McClure could find no connection.

Part of the problem was the sources. In 19th-century Quebec, records were handwritten, often illegibly and with no regard for proper spelling by census takers going from house to house. They could collect information from a servant, a child or anyone else who answered the door. To make matters worse, the language barrier between French and English meant that a Québécois-speaker might render a name like Dixon as "Dison." As a result, one enumerator recorded an ancestor named Wentworth (a family name I was familiar with) as "Umford."

Talkin' 'Bout Their Generations
Jonathan's grandfather Arthur H. Wilson, his aunt Carol and mother Marilynne.

Such obstacles make drawing an orderly family tree akin to assembling a jigsaw puzzle with warped pieces. Still, McClure was able to untangle some threads, and we got as far as my great-great-grandfather Albert Wentworth Hill before we hit a dead end.

I HAD HIGH HOPES FOR the DNA test, which, on TV at least, can prove everything from the perp's identity to the fact that White House interns neglect to do their dry cleaning. What I received was a 12-marker Y-chromosome result that plots two things: the ultimate migration of my paternal lineage and common ancestors within 28 generations (roughly 700 years). Certainly, this would yield a little ornament on my otherwise sparse family tree.

A "haplogroup" is the common male ancestor from whom I and other people in the DNA database are descended. Mine is E1b1b1. Instead of a name, I got a British postal code. But I can now stare down any member of the Daughters of the American Revolution by saying that my family goes back 22,000 years in East Africa, that we're highly prominent in places like Poland, Belarus and Russia, and practically nonexistent in the British Isles. (Who knows? I might even be entitled to a share of Alex Haley's estate.) The bad news is that out of the 15 names they could connect me to over the last 700 years, none of them were famous. The even worse news is that I share an ancestor with Samuel Sewall, the judge in the Salem witch trials. In total, the results of the DNA test were underwhelming.

I WAS BEGINNING TO FEEL frustrated when an envelope arrived from my maternal aunt, whom I'd asked for whatever genealogical help she could provide. It was a sheaf of photocopies of old documents like the ones I'd watched McClure poring over online while I marveled at her ability to read both the handwriting and between the lines. It was painstaking, tedious work. I didn't think I could do it, although I'd felt a thrill when she found even the smallest link, like the fact that my maternal great-grandmother was born in Scotland, probably orphaned and worked as a servant in the house of a man named Campbell in Montreal. It was like trying to read detective fiction written in hieroglyphics. But I decided to see what I could decipher.

The first couple of pages were airy personal ramblings, but the third page read, in script worthy of John Hancock, "James Hill, son of James Hill of Reading, Berkshire, married to Susanna, daughter of William Elgar of Deal in Kent, at St. Giles in the Fields, 29 August, 1835." It listed their eight children, and John Wentworth Hill, who would one day sire Albert, was number seven. Reading this made me feel like I'd found and deciphered the Rosetta Stone.

Of course, I don't know if there's a connection with the famous Elgar, but there may be. I'll keep poking around. I'll send in the government forms. And hopefully I'll learn more than that luxury ship captains liked to dance with my grandmother.

Which I think is ultimately what researching genealogy is all about. It's like reading a mystery where you're the protagonist, and there literally is no end. ×××

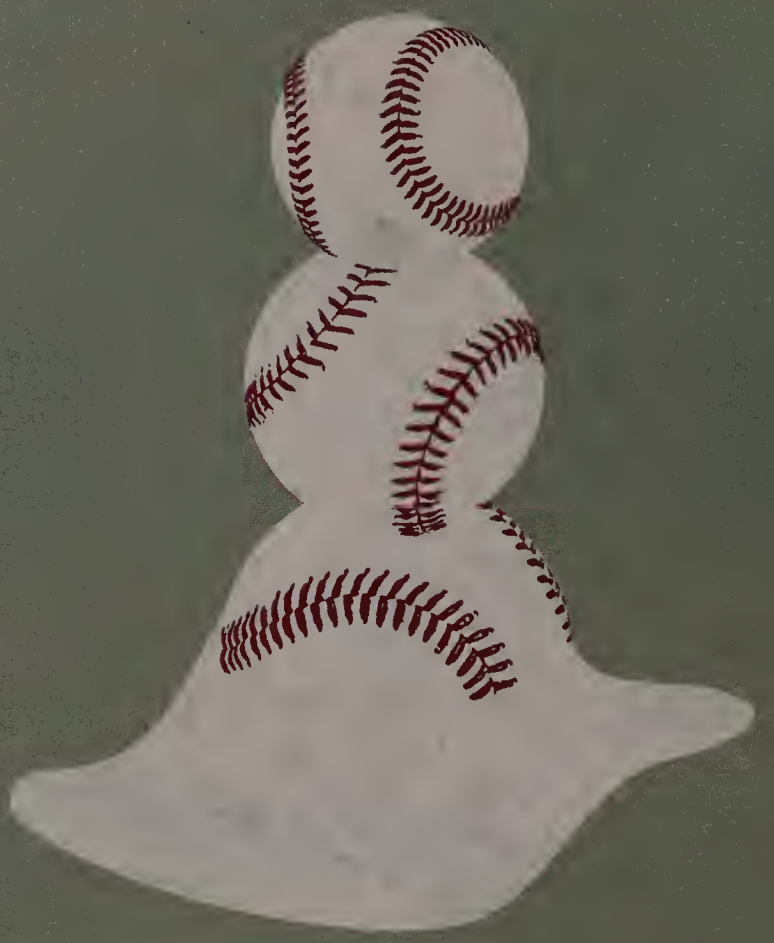
STYLE PROFILE / by Amanda Knorr

I front a rock band called Up From the Sky.

I wear dark clothes onstage and in general—it's sort of a Johnny Cash thing.

We've joked about making a "look" for the band, but we really just do it for fun.

I like wing tips, big metal belt buckles with animals on them, old leather motorcycle jackets, my pocket watch, well-worn Irish caps, ankle boots by Stacy Adams and making my own jewelry from shoelaces.



I don't get a lot of things tailored... mostly just the used stuff that I buy. But I [go to] Mauro's on East Broadway in Southie.

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Due Date ★★ Director Todd Phillips and star Zach Galifianakis brought an unexpected edge of aggression to 2009's sleeper smash The Hangover, which made sense as it was a tale of loutish dudes on a lost weekend. Alas, their follow-up is a rather shameless rip-off of John Hughes' Planes, Trains and Automobiles starring Robert Downey Jr. as a Type-A yuppie stuck traveling cross-country with Galifianakis' emotionally stunted, grieving loser. Hughes' 1987 holiday perennial might be slightly overrated, but the innate sweetness of Steve Martin and John Candy compensated for the frustrating travel contrivances. In a bold but ultimately misguided move, Phillips ramps up the unpleasantness, complete with gunshot wounds, rampant profanity, one too many car chases and even a masturbating dog. Downey might be the only actor charming enough to get away with punching a child, but the entire enterprise suffers from desperate envelope-pushing. It's ugly for its own sake, with Galifianakis' inscrutable performance suggesting that he's already on his way to becoming the next Jack Black. (In the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★ Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of J.K. Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins midspeech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

How Do You Know ★★ Floundering and weird in ways that few contemporary romantic comedies can emulate, writer/director James L. Brooks' already legendary box-office bomb cost somewhere around $120 million, despite containing not a single distinctive visual image. Reese Witherspoon stars as an uptight Olympic softball player torn between the affections of Owen Wilson's dopey Washington Nationals relief pitcher and Paul Rudd's soon-to-be-indicted CEO. Rom-com shenanigans ensue, but in a strangely unpredictable fashion that's either genre-busting or just plain clueless. Jack Nicholson hams it up to depressingly little effect as Rudd's cheerfully corrupt father while scenes meander hither and yon, breaking up tried-and-true formulas and chasing their own tails. The brilliant Rudd escapes unscathed, throwing himself into the role with reckless abandon. Witherspoon and Wilson fare poorly, however, playing retreads of familiar parts, fumbling around directionless in too many go-nowhere scenes in search of a story. Didn't anybody actually write this out before they started filming? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

I Love You Phillip Morris ★ ½ Shelved since its Sundance premiere almost two years ago, the self-satisfied directorial debut of Bad Santa screenwriters Glenn Ficarra and John Requa stars Jim Carrey in the true story of conman Steven Jay Russell. A habitual jail-breaker, Rus-

Gosling and Williams paint a portrait of love gone wrong.

Blue Valentine ★★★★
Starring Ryan Gosling, Michelle Williams, Faith Wladyka and Mike Vogel. Screenplay by Derek Cianfrance, Joey Curtis and Cami Delavigne. Directed by Cianfrance. At Kendall Square.

David Russo

THE GHOST OF JOHN Cassavetes looms large over writer/director Derek Cianfrance's second feature.

I mean this as the highest of compliments, since more than 40 years ago Cassavetes almost single-handedly redefined American cinema, telling independently financed, stubbornly personal tales of the suburban, the angry and the forgotten. He made movies about the kinds of things nobody else would ever bother making movies about. Like what happens when love dies.

Blue Valentine is a vicious little number, charting the courtship and dissolution of a marriage, often in alternating scenes. Whiplashing from the dizzying heights of adolescent infatuation back to middle-age sadness, the movie somehow captures both the euphoria of attraction and the hellish claustrophobia of a failed relationship. It's exasperating, infuriating and something very special.

Ryan Gosling, who brought such odd and unexpected tangents to the role of a crackhead schoolteacher in his breakout feature Half Nelson, stars here as Dean, a swaggering bad-boy who likes to drink beer for breakfast and does a terrible job of hiding his heart of gold. A mumble-mouthed high-school dropout working for a moving company, Dean seemingly can't help himself from lavishing random acts of kindness upon clients who couldn't care less. He's raw, sensitive and almost achingly unguarded.

The only person in the world who sees this is Michelle Williams' Cindy, a local girl who's been around the block a few times only to be stranded with the kind of dim-bulb jock boyfriend who always promises to pull out, yet always stays in. She dotes on her invalid grandmother, wondering aloud if this is all there really is.

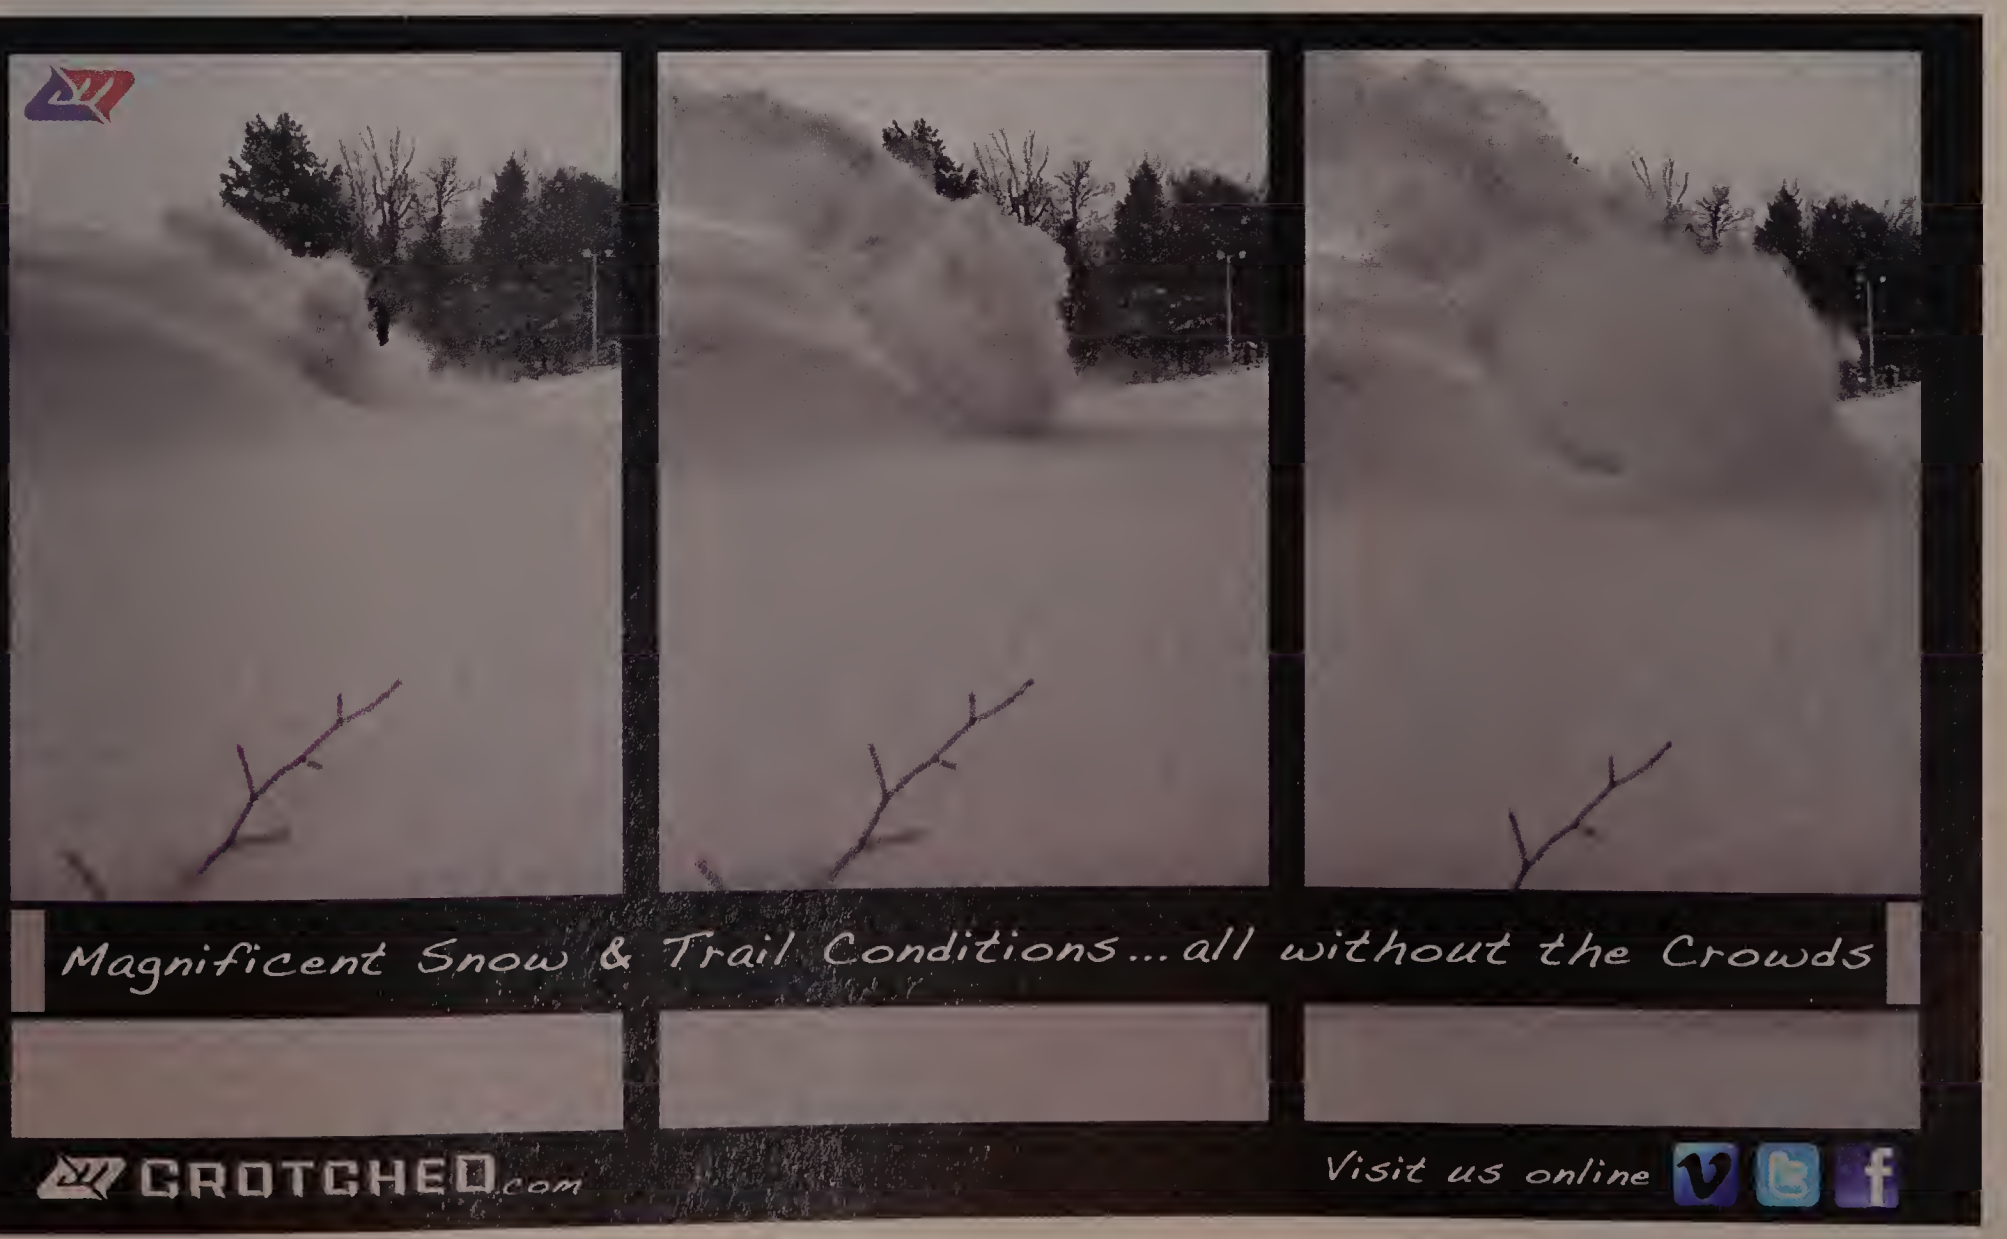
The connection between Dean and Cindy is first electric, then deadening. Cianfrance's cruelest cuts are between the beginning and the end of their relationship. Though sometimes too schematic in its construction, the movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam until there's nothing left but hurt.

Toggling back and forth, it's tough to reconcile Gosling's shambling, drunken wreck with his alternate, 20s-something dreamer. His hairline retreating, fingertips stained with nicotine and paint-flecks, Dean's trying the best he can to salvage things according to his own severely limited abilities, booking a weekend at a cheesy sex motel in the Poconos (he has a gift certificate) and begging Cindy to drop the kid off at her dad's so they can get loaded and screw like the old days.

The movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam.

Even far away from home, the same passive-aggressive fights keep erupting. There's bad drunkenness, desultory sex and the most painful second honeymoon you'll ever witness.

Williams has a brilliantly opaque performance style—at times her face is a blank slate, inviting the audience to draw its own conclusions. At other moments she's so cryptic that she almost disappears. But what I don't think we've ever seen before is what comes through in Blue Valentine's sadistic flashbacks. In early scenes she has a coltish, agonizing vulnerability that matches Gosling's yearning.



You'll keep rooting for these kids to get together, even though you know they're just going to tear each other apart.

So we go, round and round. Saddled with money woes and family problems, the two just can't stop ripping into each other. What once seemed so idyllic and full of possibility now feels like a dead end. Gosling gets the showboat part, pounding walls (and others), but Williams gets the trickier role, requiring steely resolve.

All Dean's mood-swings, excessive drinking and lack of ambition were funny once—romantic even. Yet several years down the road there's a daughter to think about, and a future that just isn't happening. His idea of a grand romantic gesture is to show up at her office and jealously punch out her boss, and Cindy has no choice but to shut down. It's an incredibly daring performance. He gets the big moments, but she's the one who has to let go.

Cianfrance wears the Cassavetes influence on his sleeve, shooting in shallow-focus, hand-held close-ups and allowing long scenes to play out for minutes on end without interruption. His faults lie in the construction, particularly having shot the flashbacks on film and the breakup on digital, often calling a bit too much attention to his own cleverness in that regard.

Still, this movie destroyed me. ✖✖✖ sell routinely defrauded and eluded creditors and captors in a rather ingenious white-collar crime spree. He was also a homosexual, which the filmmakers have decided is not just the only interesting thing about his story, but also the end-all-be-all of modern comedy. Carrey, a needy performer at his most manic and pleading, vamps it up with Ewan McGregor's absurdly naïve Southern belle, and both graphically swap spit (among other things) in one confrontational close-up after another. Downplaying the tale's more intriguing elements in favor of vulgarity and shock value, Ficarra and Requa apparently suffer under the delusion that there's nothing more scandalous than the sight of boys kissing. Get over it, guys. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At Coolidge Corner, Kendall Square and West Newton.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Love and Other Drugs ★★ ½ By turns a raunchy bedroom farce, a health-care industry satire, a chick flick and a '90s nostalgia piece, watching Love and Other Drugs sometimes feels like channel surfing. Jake Gyllenhaal's callow, studly drug rep meets his match in Anne Hathaway's brassy Bohemian artist, who shares his hobby of casual fornication. Despite the best efforts of both parties, they soon find themselves in (gasp!) a relationship. Things get tricky, as she suffers from early onset Parkinson's. Thanks to Hathaway's marvelous performance, we see a young woman always on her guard, determined to shield herself from any attachments, as they'll inevitably end in heartbreak. It's a gutsy turn with some surprisingly sharp edges. But the sharper Hathaway gets, the gummier the movie becomes. Gyllenhaal is Hollywood's luckiest actor, and not just because his job entails rolling around with a naked Anne Hathaway. Has such a modestly talented actor ever been so consistently outmatched onscreen? (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

127 Hours ★★ In 2003, Aron Ralston was on a solo climbing expedition in Utah's Blue John Canyon when he fell and got his right arm pinned by a boulder. With no food, precious little water and not a soul for miles, Ralston was trapped for five days, eventually freeing himself by cutting off his arm with the dull blade of a cheap multipurpose tool. It's a grim survival tale—and another reminder of why I seldom go outdoors. But Slumdog Millionaire director Danny Boyle tackles the story with his usual frenzy, zipping the camera around and throwing so much junk at the screen, I thought I saw a kitchen sink in there somewhere. It's all so busy, so self-consciously virtuosic, that the movie never engages with its own premise. Despite a fine one-man-show by James Franco, we never face the horror of Ralston's isolation, as the five days go by awfully fast. There's no catharsis when he's freed because the movie never bothers to sit still. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Rabbit Hole ★★★★ Grief is so much messier and confusing than most movies allow. The miracle of this small, revealing and surprisingly funny gem from director John Cameron Mitchell is that the story begins long after most pictures would've rolled the credits. It's been nine months since a suburban couple (strik-

Reel Time

Factory Made Google "Danny Williams" and you'll find plenty of information about the boxer, the politican and the musician. You won't, however, find much about the Harvard-dropout-turned-filmmaker who eventually became Andy Warhol's lover. A Walk Into the Sea: Danny Williams and the Warhol Factory mixes interviews with footage from 20 newly discovered experimental films to deconstruct the mystery behind Williams' 1966 disappearance, Warhol's infamous crowd and their relationship. The film plays through Jan. 14 at the MFA.

Jussie Martin

ingly well-played by Nicole Kidman and Aaron Eckhart) lost their four-year-old son in a car accident. Based on an off-Broadway play by David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole is primarily concerned with questions about moving on, how soon is too soon and can things ever go back to any semblance of normal? As evidenced in his Hedwig and the Angry Inch and triumphant Shortbus, Mitchell is a filmmaker who genuinely likes people, a much scarcer trait than you might imagine. Deeply compassionate and attuned to the odd, amusing moments that sometimes erupt during emotional anguish, Rabbit Hole feels awkward and real, accepting that there are no easy answers. (At Kendall Square.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

Somewhere ★★ Nobody does ennui like Sofia Coppola. Amid her plush, often absurdly luxurious hotel-scapes lurks a deep-seated unease. All the soft-focus photography and designer fashions can't disguise the gnawing loneliness that haunts her characters as they sleepwalk through empty lives. Sadly, after only four films this is starting to feel a little routine. Wandering around for a few days with a hollowed-out action-movie hero (Stephen Dorff) as he chases skirts, glad-hands reporters and barely connects with his estranged daughter (Elle Fanning), Somewhere feels like a regurgitation of Coppola's greatest hits. There's a wonderful sense of isolation and little else. Dorff falls asleep at strip shows, avoids his exes and can't quite muster up any understanding of his child's needs. Falling back on that gorgeous atmosphere, Coppola's movie ends up as stunted as its protagonist. This is the first 10 minutes of Lost in Translation stretched out for two hours, and Stephen Dorff is no Bill Murray. (At Kendall Square.)

The Tempest ★ Julie Taymor has a theater director's eye for how movies work. That isn't a compliment. After making an unintentional laugh riot out of the Beatles' catalog with Across the Universe, Taymor retreats to her safe haven of Shakespeare. (Titus, after all, was her first and least objectionable feature.) The film's biggest innovation turns out to be a non-starter: Prospero is now Prospera, played by Helen Mirren, yet there's shockingly little insight or commentary gained by the gender swap. Mirren just acts like a dude in drag. The Tempest isn't an easy nut to crack—even the best adaptations struggle with the fantastical elements and unwieldy structure. Taymor and cinematographer Stuart Dryburgh have shot their Hawaiian locations in the ugliest fashion imaginable, all gloomy, overcast skies and dreary natural light. This choice, as well as the jittery, handheld camerawork, are presumably intended to ground the tale's supernatural flourishes, but instead just call even more attention to the gaudy CGI creations. (At Kendall Square.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured and absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Unstoppable ★★★ Director Tony Scott's fifth collaboration with Denzel Washington is a slick, efficient machine without a single thought in its head besides keeping you entertained for 98 minutes. Based on actual events presumably exaggerated out of all conceivable proportion, the film follows a runaway freight train roaring through rural Pennsylvania. To sweeten the deal, this particular choo-choo happens to be laden with hazardous chemicals, prompting Rosario Dawson's railroad manager to describe it as "a missile the size of the Chrysler building!" Lucky for us, a couple hundred miles down the line we've got a grizzled conductor (Denzel Washington) and his rookie partner (Chris Pine) on what was supposed to be a routine assignment. What makes this film such fun is that there's no villain, just a one-thing-after-another series of logistical problems. Unstoppable's clean narrative lines lock Scott into a scenario where his usual restless camera style can't shake the production, even though the guy apparently has never found a scene that he couldn't shoot from a swooping helicopter. (In the suburbs.)

STRING BENDS

The Punch Brothers cross bluegrass borders in search of transcendence.

The Punch Brothers play the Somerville Theatre on Jan. 13.

C. Taylor Crothers

SINGER/MANDOLINIST Chris Thile sees at least one parallel between bluegrass forefather Bill Monroe and modern rock band Radiohead: the desire to experiment.

"Bill was constantly tinkering with his creation," says Thile, leader of the New York-based Punch Brothers. "Any music that's healthy will be doing that. That's the problem with genre. To keep it intact or keep it cohesive, there has to be some weird limitations placed on things—and that's not how creative people work."

For an example, just look to the Punch Brothers. Thile and his bandmates play acoustic instruments and touch on the jazzy improvisations and high-pitched harmonies of the bluegrass tradition. But, as he adds, "There, the similarities end."

The Punch Brothers give Thile the kind of sleek, sophisticated vehicle he needs to expand on ground he broke with his previous trio, Nickel Creek. Like that commercially successful band, the Punch Brothers are influenced by progressive bluegrass artists such as Béla Fleck and Edgar Meyer. Yet they're just as likely to take cues from Bartók or Radiohead, a band whose tunes they've covered.

"Now it's all over the deck," says Thile, whose group played the Wang Theatre last fall with T Bone Burnett's star-laced Speaking Clock Revue. "The things that we enjoy are united by a spirit of musical exploration."

For their 2008 debut, Punch, Thile steered the quintet through his classically structured "The Blind Leaving the Blind," a four-movement rumination on the collapse of his marriage. But for the group's latest album, Antifogmatic, he loosened his control to spark more collaborative interaction.

"The reason to collaborate in the first place is there's an increased possibility for transcendence," he says from a train traveling between Providence and New York. "Now the ideas are coming from everyone, and we're all pitching in. It's liquid."

"This music is dynamic and occasionally explosive," says Thile. "It is pretty, but that's not where it lives."

It's a more fluid process when you're surrounded by such top-flight peers as fiddler Gabe Witcher, banjoist Noam Pikelny, guitarist Chris Eldridge and upright bassist Paul Kowert. It's easier still when you live and work in the same place. "We've settled down into a more sustainable band dynamic," the 29-year-old California native says of their move to New York City. "To live alongside one another really helps the creative process. You have more common references."

For regular fodder, they go out drinking together. Although the Punch Brothers took their name from a jingle in a Mark Twain story, the concept of imbibing has graced many a song since they opened their debut with "Punch Bowl." Antifogmatic adopts an old term for a beverage hearty enough to face rough weather, and the new album features a stomping number called "Rye Whiskey."

"The boys and I are fairly ensconced in New York's beautiful cocktail culture," Thile says. That exposure only fuels his tales of romantic faith and uncertainty. "The recklessness of waning youth is really interesting to me, how people conduct themselves romantically and also just communally. So many of the stories I've been interested in telling lyrically lately have been from observing people's behavior on these nights out."

Antifogmatic is infused with this newfound urban energy. The album's producer, Jon Brion, also has worked with artists as diverse as Fiona Apple, Brad Mehldau, Kanye West and Of Montreal. "Acoustic music specialists have this kind of delicate, clinical approach, and Jon has a little more of a mad scientist approach," Thile says. "This music is dynamic and occasionally explosive. It is pretty, but that's not where it lives."

The lead track "You Are" evokes the arc and attitude of an alt-rock song despite its acoustic instrumentation. "Next to the Trash" spins bluegrass and sea-shanty eddies around a frisky vocal more akin to Dave Matthews or Mumford & Sons. Other tracks float sparse balladry. Despite their use of these conventions, the quintet's edgy tonalities and strange melodic, harmonic and rhythmic shifts can prove unsettling.

"It's always sort of veering in and out of fairly conventional areas of music, like you're patting someone on the shoulder and then slapping them in the face," Thile says. "I love that combination." ✖✖✖

Finding Tempo Eclectic is an understatement. An opera singer, a French violinist, a Serbian bass player and a Gypsy-trained guitarist create the worldly sound of Fishtank Ensemble. Together since 2005, the band fuses jazz, opera and flamenco on their third album, Woman in Sin. From a rustic Transylvanian village to the jazzy streets of Paris, be transported by their tunes as they perform at Club Passim on Jan. 14.

What's That Expression?

Mr. Brightside

Vibrant colors and abstract figures abound in 20th-century expressionist painter George McNeil's Trans/Figure/Ation. On display at Acme Fine Art, the artist's fourth solo show presents a transitional group of works created between 1959 and 1971. Using figural shapes, abstract landscapes and a sensation of depth, his energetic compositions are on display beginning Jan. 14.

Ripple Effect

What Lies Beneath Kim Edwards knows a thing or two about secrets. She chronicled the lives of a family destroyed by deception in her best-selling debut novel, The Memory Keeper's Daughter. Now she takes on another sordid history with The Lake of Dreams, about a woman haunted by her father's death who begins digging for answers at her childhood home. After she sees something peculiar in a former flame's artwork, her search upsets more than dust. Edwards shares a few of her own secrets at Brookline Booksmith on Jan. 6.

Understands that a caterpillar is a butterfly.

That a dolphin is a mammal.

That a mother has to leave the house.

And that a locked closet is a babysitter.

Abuse is not always easy to see. Last year there were 35,000 children we could afford to help, and 45,000 we couldn't. As a private non-profit organization, we need your help.

DISHING IT OUT

Putting Their Money Where the Mouths Are

Cash doesn't grow on trees, which is why it's a damn good thing that the Grow Clinic at Boston Medical Center has a small forest of philanthropists who attended its Food For Thought Gala at the Mandarin Oriental, Boston.

On hand to raise money for malnourished kids and to fete über-benefactor Don Rodman was a bevy of bighearted big shots, including Judaism's answer to Santa Claus, Ted Cutler, with his offspring Ellen Calmas and Joel and Randi Cutler, the beneficent Steve and Joan Belkin with their brunette bombshell of a daughter, Amy, twin financial whizzes Wes and Paul Karger, snack magnate Mark Andrus with stunning jewelry designer Brelyn Spindel, political smoothie Mike Ross, delectable duo Christopher Myers and Joanne Chang, the irresistible Mary Wolfson and her other half, Bob Rosenberg, attorney-at-large Jon Norris, Back Bay bluebloods Leigh and George Denny, design avatar Manuel de Santaren, Beacon Hill babe Meg Gordon, dapper developer Robin Brown and the lovely Marcia, Republican also-ran Charlie Baker, gorgeous blonde emcee Heather Unruh, and so on and so forth.

In fact, the crowd was so scintillating that the staff had a hard time herding the guests in from the cocktail party and getting them to sit down for dinner. Eventually they did, at tables set with edible centerpieces that were later recycled for the charity's food pantry.

Overheard by the bar:
One guest, describing the charity's mission, used the term "underserved youth," to which another guest responded, "That would be me. I'm going to get another martini."

Steppin' Out

Don't tell the Rockettes, but the ladies of the Vincent Club are at it again and better than ever.

A quick primer for the uninitiated: An all-female club dedicated to raising money for Vincent Memorial Hospital—the women's health arm of MGH—it's a bastion of high-Wasp Brahminism. For 110 years, its members staged an annual show that featured "the Drill"—an intricate marching routine—as part of an elaborate original musical that also included a torch number, a flapper scene, etc. (Fun fact: Tommy Tune got his start with the Vincent Show). In 2002, however, they canceled this time-honored tradition, which seemed to have gone the way of white gloves, handwritten thank-you notes and the three-martini lunch... until they decided to revive it last year.

Paul Karger and Pamela Vargas at the Food for Thought gala

Brelyn Spindel and Mark Andrus at the Food for Thought gala

Cassandra Henderson, Vicky Whitney and Jane Marshall at the Vincent Carol

The Drill at the Vincent Carol

And thank goodness they did. This year's Vincent Carol was a delight, attracting the blue-blooded likes of Vicky (aka Mrs. Thomas Handasyd Perkins Whitney XIV) and her affable other half, Tom, their show-stopping daughter, Blake, chanteuse extraordinaire Evelyn Treacy and the very lucky Michael, moderator Cokie Perry and her proud hubby, Lee, the eternally lovely Cassandra Henderson, the improbably tall Nicholas Holder and his twinkle-toed wife, Mary Kay, red-headed siren Doreen Corkin squired by the debonair Chris Mitchum, babe-a-licious blondes Jennifer Donaldson and Kimberlea Tracey, grande dame Hope Baker, the lovely Lydia Kimball, thoroughbreds Susan Hunnewell, Lee Sprague and Carla Cabot, and numerous post-debs, young-marrieds, yummy-mummies and post-facelift socialites, accompanied by the men who love them.

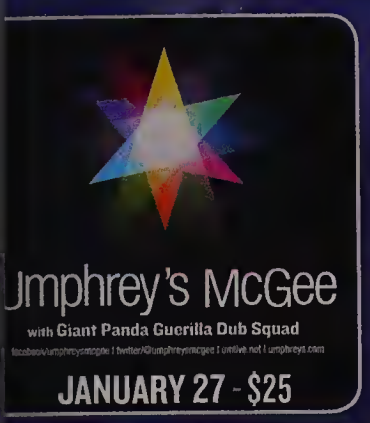
The cabaret-style setting was intimate, the show was exactly the right length, and the witty repartee flew fast and furious. The following are a few examples:

"I love these veiled insults, like, 'Who did your makeup?' if they think you look like a hooker."

"I specifically had my hair done to look Kwanzaa-ish."

"All I want for Christmas are the two front diamonds in that necklace."

And (my personal favorite): "She looks terrific. She just can't smile too much, or her belly-button shows."



In short: Job well done! Now how about resurrecting the three-martini lunch? ×××

Love Drunk

There's nothing harder to write than a love letter. Passion has a tendency to blunder into cliché, sticking its foot in a pile of common sentiment. For thousands of years, ardent minds have waxed lyrical, but even the yardstick poems ("Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?" "Had we but world enough, and time," "She's my cherry pie,") pale in the gray, rational moment when you're emptying the dryer lint.

Which is why writing these words is so difficult. But here goes.

Beer, how can I forget our first moment together? That bygone can of Heineken, so green with promise… the wet snap, the breathy pour down the side of a Ronald McDonald glass. Then a velvet wash through the belly and spirit and, lo!, joyous inebriation! Ours is a love as deep as the molten core of planets, as wheeling as the firmament. At least until my liver shrivels into a blackened nub.

True, our partings aren't sweet. And you cause bad judgment, like the time I tried to steal a neighbor's kiddie pool thinking it was an errant pig. In fact, if it weren't for you, I'd never have degenerated into the sort of person who tries to rustle pigs. When I think about all the boorish, stupid things I've done with you, sometimes I just shake with shame and regret. But that might just be the DTs.

Still, we're together, you and I. Oh, and your cousin in the unrefrigerated aisle is pretty fine, too. Which is why Sandy Block leads a tasting tour of Old and New World wines in this issue. Meanwhile, Ezra pens his own love letter to your bloating, impairing, divine essence.

Tastes Like Victory

A BROAD PALATE

THE PATH OF THE amateur wine connoisseur can be traced in the drinking history of professional hockey player Mark Recchi. After winning his first championship with Pittsburgh at the age of 22, what did he gulp from Lord Stanley's Cup? "Beer." Under the tutelage of Mario Lemieux, Recchi expanded his tastes, and when he won the Cup in 2006, he says, "I had wine in there, I had beer in there, Champagne—I had it all going." Now with his own cellar stocked with classic Bordeaux and California cabs, what will the 42-year-old sip should his second year with the Bruins prove victorious? Perhaps the 1970 Pétrus he's been saving for a special occasion? "Definitely wine," he assures.

NICK ALTSCHULLER

We Are Golden

When we first reported on the double-fried promise of Saus last May, it seemed inevitable that snack-happy Bostonians would be getting their frite fix within days—weeks, at the latest. But then, nothing.

The doors at the Faneuil Hall spot have been locked for nearly eight months, but passersby who stop to peek inside the windows on Union Street will probably see owners Chin Kuo, Renee Eliah and Tanya Kropinicki hard at work. "Every month was something new, and it was extremely discouraging." Eliah says. "More than one person said to give up."

"IT WAS NOW OR NEVER."

Fortunately, the trio knows a thing or two about perseverance. They met as colleagues at a software company downtown, and when the ax started swinging, they were among the first let go. "We always wanted a lunch place like this, and we couldn't find it," Kropinicki observes. "It seemed like it was now or never."

Rolls of red tape brought the process to a halt for the first-time restaurateurs (all of whom are under 25), but a January permit approval has them on track to finally get frying come early February. "We're excited, but we're pinching ourselves," she says.

"We've had such an outpouring of people excited to try the fries and waffles," Eliah adds. "It's been hard to have to disappoint them for so long."

The menu at Saus hasn't changed much during the delay, though they've used the time to fine-tune recipes. "Feedback from our friends and social media has played a huge role in selecting our sauces," Kuo says. Among the house-made dips is the Vampire Slayer, a roasted-garlic-infused mayo for the golden fries, and a spin on Nutella, perfect for drizzling on the Belgian liège waffles. They also plan on offering two additional special sauces per week.

The walls host a collage of cartoons hand-selected by the owners, a nod to Belgian comic culture. "It's Boston meets Europe," Eliah notes. "Everyone loves fries, no matter where they're from!"

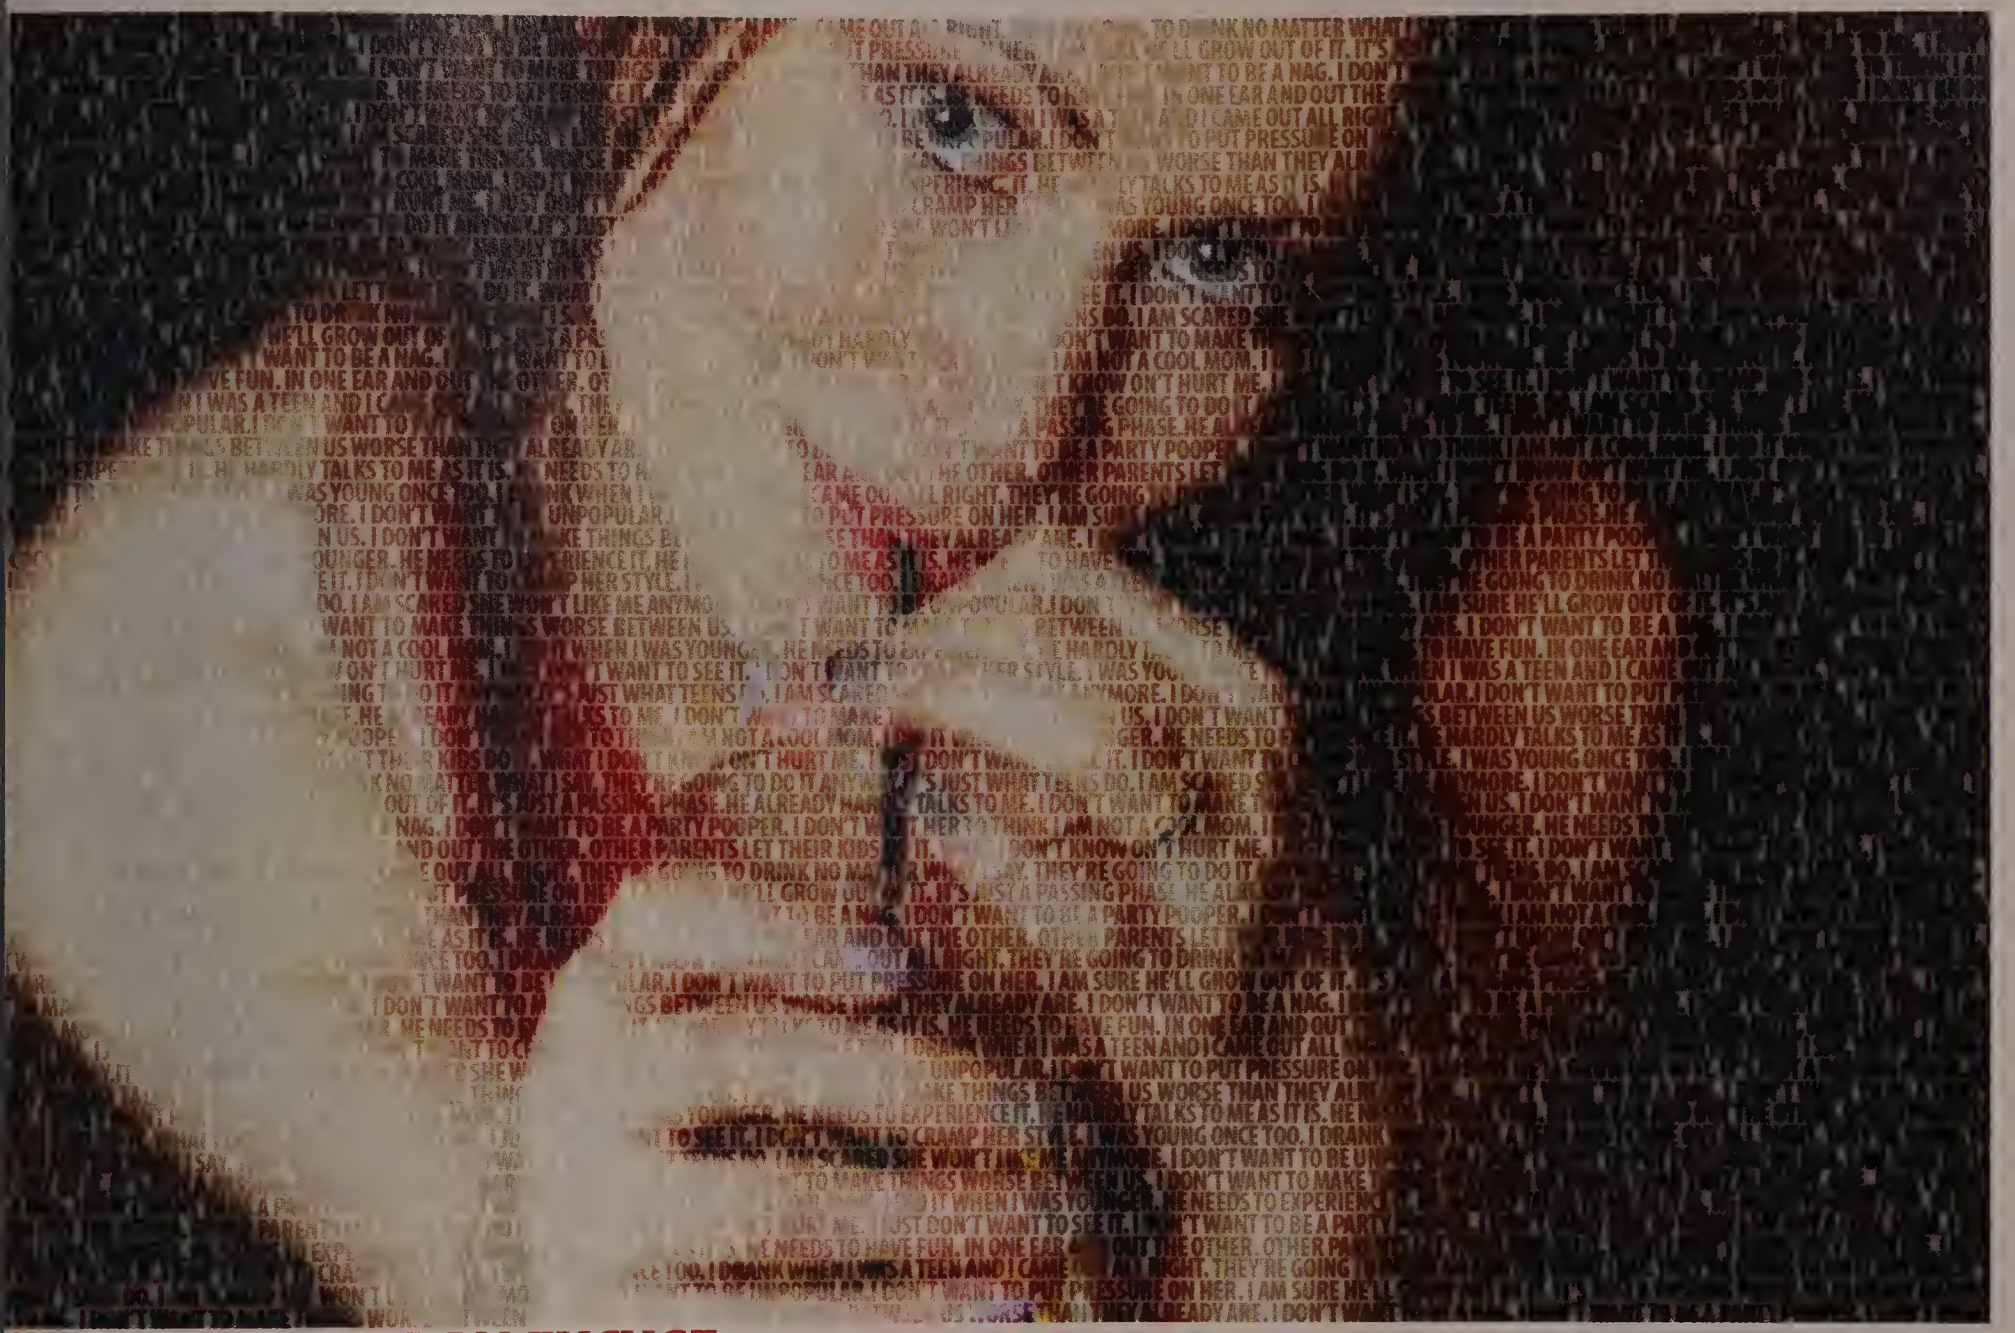
ON THE WINGS OF LOVE

TO THE YOUNG MAN WHO TENDED AN INJURED BIRD ON LINCOLN STREET: There you were, bent over caring for what looked like a young falcon on its back in shock. You were so calm, and the people who stopped seemed to take on a positive energy for this beautiful creature. I don't know how you did it, but your kind attention surely helped that bird and touched many hearts. Thank you.

Newly inspired



To the grim sleeper:

You may not like people in their pajamas, but I don't like being sick. My illness leaves me with [small windows] for my treatments and medications. I can't eat before treatment, spend around five hours in bed to have them, and can't eat for a day or two after. The only time I have to eat is within an hour or so after treatment. That means heading to the nearest restaurant without getting dressed for the first and last time in several days. Do I think it's cute? Nope. Could I put on a pair of pants? Not usually. But do I brush my teeth and comb my hair? Of course. Do you want to change places? I'd be willing to bet not. Pajama girl

To those sad-faced commuters:

After a series of wrecked automobiles, I decided to use the MBTA. On Christmas Eve, I boarded the #77 Bus and, bursting with the spirit of the season, wished everyone a happy holiday. No one, except the bus driver who resembled St. Nick himself (beard and all), returned my salutation. To those other passengers, I feel sorry for you. A very happy commuter Unrequited crush? Bad hair? Need to vent? Send your e-mails of love and spleen to impersonals@improper.com, or visit improper.com/impersonals.

I DON'T WANT TO BE UNPOPULAR. I DON'T WANT TO PUT PRESSURE ON HER. I AM SURE HE'LL GROW OUT OF IT. IT'S JUST A PASSING PHASE. HE ALREADY HARDLY TALKS TO ME. I DON'T WANT TO BE A NAG. I DON'T WANT TO BE A PARTY POOPER. I DON'T WANT HER TO THINK I AM NOT A COOL MOM. I DON'T KNOW ON'T HURT ME. I JUST DON'T WANT TO SEE IT. I DON'T WANT TO CRAMP HER STYLE. I WAS YOUNG ONCE TOO. I DRANK WHEN I WAS A TEEN AND I CAME OUT ALL RIGHT. THEY'RE GOING TO DRINK NO MATTER WHAT I SAY. THEY'RE GOING TO DO IT ANYWAY. IT'S JUST WHAT TEENS DO. I AM SCARED SHE WON'T LIKE ME ANYMORE. I DON'T WANT TO BE UNPOPULAR. I DON'T WANT TO MAKE THINGS WORSE BETWEEN US. I DON'T WANT TO MAKE THINGS WORSE THAN THEY ALREADY ARE

Good Eats

Chew Chew

When H.H. Richardson designed a train station to serve the people of Newton Centre, he probably never imagined that service would include short-order breakfasts. (And after months of delay, the locals had their doubts, too.) But when the Deluxe Station Diner—sibling to Watertown's Deluxe Town Diner—opens this month, commuters can ditch their energy bars in favor of eggs Benedict, sweet-potato waffles and regional favorite, jonnycakes. The griddle-pressed rounds of flint cornmeal take well to real maple syrup and a pat of butter. Served all day, they can fuel either a rush or a happy hour. ELIZABETH BOMZE

What's in your perfect six-pack?

Fuller's ESB, England In the winter I like to hang with friends and argue about what's wrong with the world over a malty session beer. For this I choose Fuller's Extra Special Bitter. Don't be fooled by the style—it's not bitter at all. Great for double fisting!

Birra del Borgo Re Ale Extra, Italy I usually like my IPAs to be aggressive and American, but with its subtleties and elegance, this is a reminder that there's another side to the style.

Schneider Edelweiss, Germany A bottle-conditioned, organic wheat beer. It's malty, fruity (banana, oranges) and spicy (cloves, white pepper). Although typically considered a summer ale, its spice and fruit tones have me reaching for it quite a bit this time of year.

Brasserie Ellezelloise Hercule Stout, Belgium Not only is it named after Agatha Christie's Belgian detective, Hercule Poirot, it has great packaging with a flip-top lid. With 9 percent ABV, this Russian imperial stout is my go-to winter warmer.

Cisco Whale's Tale Pale Ale, Nantucket The perfect last-call beer. It's easy drinking and has just the right amount of hops for ending the night. It's also local, which makes it taste even better.

Coors Banquet Pale Lager, Colorado There's a time and place for every beer, and no room for snobbery. Therefore, I advocate the Coors Banquet. Sometimes you need to get back to your roots. Be careful though—the adjuncts lead to a brutal hangover.

FIT THE HILL

Dot's restaurant renaissance continues.

IN THE SPIRIT OF Dorchester standouts dBar and Ashmont Grill, Ken Osherow brings Savin Bar and Kitchen to the Dot's Savin Hill neighborhood.

"This area really needs a nice restaurant," says Osherow, who also co-owns the nearby McKenna's Café and Savin Scoop. He promises not a pub or a sports bar, but "a neighborhood scene with really good food, moderately priced." With an open kitchen and a bar of reclaimed oak from an old mill in Vermont, the renovations to the old C.F. Donovan's space constitute "a complete overhaul."

Savin Bar and Kitchen is slated to open by the end of February.

THERE'S NO QUESTION that Paul Manzelli, the new bar manager at Bergamot in Somerville, knows his way around a shaker. Manzelli met Bergamot co-owner Servio Garcia back when Garcia was general manager of Casablanca and hired him as a bartender (from there he worked his way up to bar manager, then assistant GM). Manzelli's résumé includes stints at Mistral and Craigie on Main, where he worked with the popular Tom Schlesinger-Guidelli. Right now, he says two cocktails "we're pretty high on" are the newly created Momisette Sour and the hot Elixir d'Auge, which combines Calvados, Benedictine and ras el hanout-citrus syrup. Tasty!

GET READY for a tantalizing twofer in Jamaica Plain: a tapas restaurant/wine bar with an attached book/music store. David Doyle, who's run the Rhythm and Muse store with his wife for 11 years, will open Tres Gatos toward the end of January or beginning of February. The head chef is Marcos Sanchez, former sous chef at Dante.

Say Cheese

As a new semester kicks off, the long-held dream of Boston College students—and hungry Cleveland Circle commuters—has come true: grilled cheese on wheels. Manned by James and Mike DiSabatino, Roxy's Gourmet Grilled Cheese Truck will soon turn out melty munchies just like the ones the brothers whipped up while touring with Mike's metal band. There's a rotating menu of breads (sourdough, brioche), cheese (goat, cheddar), fixings (pineapple, candied bacon) and, of course, fried local pickles with cheese sauce. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Drink of the Moment

Molecular Consumption

A man with a passion for particle physics, chef/owner Jerome Picca of Small Plates Restaurant in Cambridge runs his kitchen with an unstable balance of right brain versus left brain, creativity versus precision and playfulness versus specificity. Because Small Plates only has a beer and wine license, necessity has forced Picca to be inventive with his cocktails.

The process of creating the ←CHOCOLATE MERLOT MARTINI ($10) requires a Belgian chocolate sauce (made from a secret recipe) of the precise chemical composition required for dissolution in merlot. The concoction is poured into pre-chilled glasses (ice would cause the chocolate to congeal) and garnished with fresh fruit for a burst of brightness.

Picca's blend has an earthy, round flavor with a smooth texture. A hit of chocolate at the end melds with Kahlua for a taste that's more mocha latte than Milky Way, while a dash of traditional sake adds complexity and a crisp finish.

Each cocktail on Picca's menu is in a process of continuing evolution. "You have to share knowledge or else you stagnate," he explains. A mad scientist at heart, Picca experiments with ingredients but only serves what he views as perfected recipes. "We try to stay inside the box," Picca says. "But the box has dotted lines." LINDSEY CANANT

Wine

The Great Unknown

Given their history as red-wine-producing countries, Italy and Spain are both in the midst of an astonishing white-wine renaissance. Each year another crop of ancient heirloom varieties emerges from obscurity, and in some cases, near extinction. Names like albariño, verdejo, godello and now falanghina.

When I first heard of falanghina, I thought it was in reference to a character in a Fellini movie. Grown for at least 2,000 years in Campania, why has it now emerged as my go-to white wine in Italian restaurants? Delicious consistency. Usually no oak, but plenty of warmth and texture. Good mineral purity and persistence of flavor. Occasionally a hint of concentrated pineapple, but generally more a mélange of herb, apple and citrus. Most importantly, it's ultra-versatile with food. Oh, and it's fun to say.

Terredora diPaolo Falanghina IRPINIA DOC, 2009 (AVAILABLE FOR ORDER FROM LOCAL MERCHANTS). Crafted by the region's largest producer from late-harvested hillside grapes, this falanghina is lush and flavorful with subtle hints of peach, lavender and bread dough. Aged for an extended period on the yeast lees without barrel treatment, its juicy flavors come across as nuanced and mellow. Dry and tangy, it's a perfect match for a bold shellfish stew.

Feudi di San Gregorio Falanghina SANNIO DOC, 2009 ($16, V CIRACE & SONS, BOSTON). Made in identical fashion, the Feudi is a touch creamier with just a bit less body. Its captivating aromas of parmesan, candied dates and nutmeg leave a fresh, crisp impression. Enjoy it with shrimp with pasta in white sauce, or with broiled haddock.

Mastroberardino Falanghina SANNIO DOC, 2008 ($21, CELLAR WINE & SPIRITS, CAMBRIDGE). Like the other two falanghinas, this sees no oak but is aged for a short time with the yeast. It's a bit softer in acid and perhaps more tropically scented, but with the same herb, baked bread, appetizing cheese-like tang. Smooth and subtle, this wine is most enjoyable with charcuterie or a salad caprese.

WEIGHTY ADVICE

Food isn't the enemy in this humane diet book.

PICK UP SOMETHING TO EAT—perhaps a gourmet wrap—and enjoy a slow, attentive cruise through its textures and flavors as you read this diet book. Author Jean Fain doesn't talk calories. She emphatically advises against "waist watchers" cracking the self-punitive whip. Instead, her soothing, philosophical approach involves a mindful attitude toward eating and your (perhaps imperfect) body. Fain focuses on the trance states of hypnosis, self-hypnosis, meditation and mindfulness to bring eating into the moment. This is in pleasant contrast to the stingy deprivations and calorie-scouring paranoia of most diets; she wants you to enjoy food as children do.

The Self-Compassion Diet
By Jean Fain, MSW

Fain is a therapist and teaching affiliate at Harvard Medical School.

Her method has you write down the lashing words of the inner critic; then, to counter that harping schoolmarm, she has you record a "compassionate response." Breathing exercises help center you on the experience. One performed while touching your stomach helps you follow and feel the arc of hunger and fullness. Quizzes determine the helpfulness of friends and support groups in this dieting process. Fain reports that her therapy clients lose weight through her method, but also learn to eat with newfound pleasure. Along with providing nourishment, food deserves to be loved. ✖✖✖

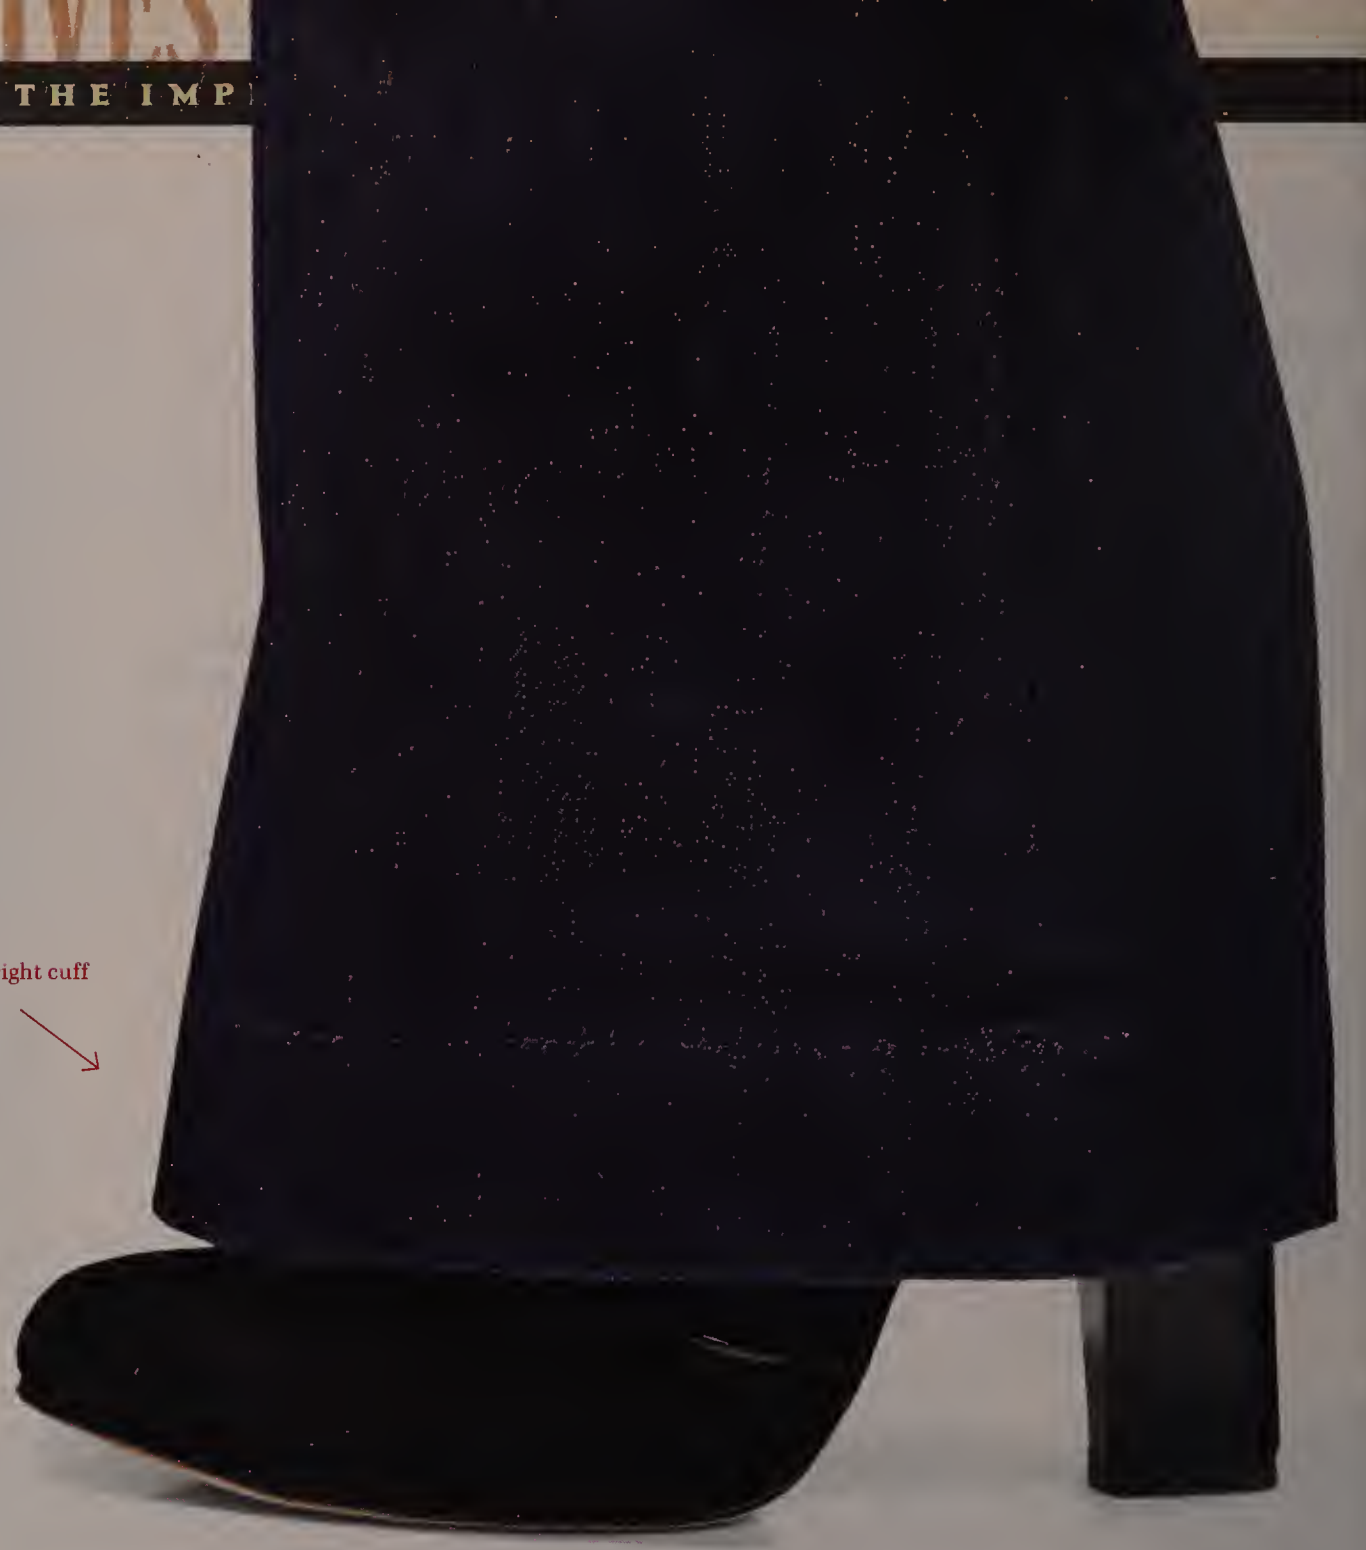
"Even a jelly donut is a worthwhile object of mindful appreciation. That is, if you permit yourself the much maligned, densely caloric treat. And stay present, without zoning out, to the full gustatory experience. The gritty sugar on fingertips, the doughy aroma that gets you salivating before your teeth sink into the soft cake, or your tongue finds the cool jelly filling."



Style

SAVED BY THE BELL

The skinny jean was the subject of smack talk not too long ago. Then came jeggings, and now, the '70s flare. The controversial cut is back, and it's a refreshing alternative to all the sausage casings out there. Fitted at the top, flowy at the bottom, it's a forgiving style, and when paired with heels can make your legs look miles long. AMANDA KNORR

PEARLS BEFORE SWINE

Island Creek Oyster Bar offers a fresh alternative for seafood.

SAFE HARBOR Head to Kenmore Square to dine on shellfish by the Citgo sign.

NO DOUBT MANY BOSTON food fanciers mourned the closing of Great Bay. I certainly did. Could anything, I wondered, fill the gastronomic chasm in Kenmore Square left by its demise? Is the venue, just around the corner from the home of Fenway Franks, capable of supporting a sophisticated seafood restaurant? After two enjoyable visits to the Island Creek Oyster Bar, my answer to both these questions is yes.

Island Creek has filled the capacious space vacated by Great Bay with a cleverly designed restaurant. The walls are decorated in a rustic fashion with oyster shells and weathered planks that baffle the ambient noise. Its menu proves that top quality doesn't have to mean top price, and its culinary artistry evidences a commitment to local, sustainable sourcing, starting with its namesake product, Island Creek oysters from Duxbury.

House-baked bread with honey-and-cayenne-spiked butter opened our meals, and Harpoon IPA ($6) and Original Sin pear cider ($6) made refreshing aperitifs. A lengthy wine list strays far from the beaten path, apparently aiming to expand the clientele's horizons. Eschewing color conventions we selected a Jean-Marc Burgaud ($32) from the Beaujolais commune of Morgon, which was tight when uncorked but opened after breathing. More memorable, a full-bodied 2007 Greek aghiorghitiko by Skouras St. George Nemea ($30) delighted with vibrant fruit and a fine finish.

As anticipated, oysters on the half shell were first-rate. They shimmered in their pristine freshness on a tray of crushed ice mounted on a French coquillage stand. Of the 10 varieties offered one night, I stuck with the locals ($2-$3.50, each). Duxbury's oysters—succulent, sweet, pleasantly briny—set a high standard that their fellow Massachusetts natives emulated as I chased them down the coast (Onset) and onto the Cape (Wellfleet). I could've eaten the horseradish-laced cocktail sauce with a bag of oyster crackers, but to savor the mollusks' delicate, delicious flavor, I consumed them unadorned.

Of the appetizers, I tried five, four of which were outstanding. The crab cake ($14), moist and devoid of filler, boasted a mild sweetness to which the red-pepper compote and yellow-eye beans posed a satisfying counterpoint. A generous serving of shelled mussels ($10) poached in white wine, garlic, parsley, shallots, couscous and cream came crowned with a garlicky crouton. The whole ensemble, supplemented by a side of excellent coleslaw ($3), was enough for our dinner one evening. Oysters Gregory ($12)—topped with bacon, paprika, charred leeks and breadcrumbs—channeled oysters Rockefeller. The great flavor and crunchy texture of three giant grilled shrimp ($11) came surrounded by roasted chestnuts, sweet potatoes and more leeks (the onion's underappreciated cousin). Only the tough and chewy fried clams ($14, small order) disappointed.

Charles' Picks

Crab cake

Seared scallops
Chocolate pudding

Main courses included a marvelous seafood casserole ($24, for one) with generous hunks of lobster, cod, sea scallops, shrimp and a medley of fresh vegetables, each component cooked perfectly. Seared New Bedford scallops ($29) arrived with kuri squash, trumpet mushrooms and kumquats, which added earthy and citrus notes to counterpoint the sweet, nutty shellfish. Day boat cod ($28) with artichoke hearts was excellent, but I found the texture of the pan-roasted trout ($24) soft and substandard. Fortunately, the trout's tasty accompaniments—celery root, Brussels sprout leaves and Madeira mushrooms—compensated.

Dessert selections (all $8) were limited, but an oversize bowl of intensely bittersweet chocolate pudding topped with unsweetened whipped cream was a winner. Servers were attentive, friendly and enthusiastic. After dining there, it was impossible not to share the sentiment. ✖✖✖

TALKING A LEAK

Earth-shattering revelations from the wiki world

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

WE'VE ALL HEARD A LOT about WikiLeaks lately. For the uninformed, WikiLeaks is a secure website that allows whistleblowers to share sensitive documents without revealing their identities. So far, leaks have revealed shocking insider information from international diplomats, such as this assessment of Fidel Castro's health, circa 2006: "Will not die immediately but will gradually lose [his] mental faculties and will become increasingly weaker until he dies." Whoa, hold the phone! You mean Castro isn't leading sunrise yoga classes outside the Havana Curves anymore? I was under the impression that he's the picture of good health.

Unfortunately, most of the documents have been pretty boring. But I happen to know that we've only viewed a mere fraction of the material. You see, I have a source within WikiLeaks who's given me advance access to forthcoming revelations. That's right—WikiLeaks leaks.

Item one concerns Bank of America. According to my source, they may sign you up for "advantage with tiered interest checking" for $25 per month. With this fantastic, consumer-friendly plan, you pay a $25 monthly fee if you have less than $10,000 in your account. The upshot, though, is that they're paying you interest: .05 percent APR. So, let's do the math: You get charged $25 per month, but at the end of the year, your $9,999 will have earned... $5! Thanks for the sweet deal, Bank of America! You're welcome for the TARP money.

Moving on to the world of fashion, you've probably noted the trend of girls wearing tights and equestrian boots. Confidential cables reveal that this fashion was conceived not by clothing designers, but by Tiger Woods, Jesse James and Bill Clinton. One leaked correspondence includes the statement, "Guys, I can't believe how [redacted] awesome it is that we got chicks to dress like this in public."

Incoming intercepted cable: Diplomats still use something called "cables" to communicate. Maybe they should upgrade to something more modern and secure, like Teddy-Grams.

Truvia is made from the bones of dissidents.

Freshly sprung leaks even stretch to the realm of unsolved mysteries. You know all those blackbirds that fell out of the sky in Arkansas? There have been some pretty stupid theories about why this happened, including the idea that they were all scared to death by New Year's Eve fireworks. The truth is that those birds were in a cult, and it was a case of mass avian suicide. Which coincidentally happened right after they flew through the military's new invisible Arkansas death ray.

On the subject of corporate espionage, I've learned that Shaws has a plan to undermine Stop & Shop management through a mole planted in the company. The mole? The official photographer who shoots the staff photos that hang on the wall near the checkout. Leaked cables indicate that Shaws intends to demoralize Stop & Shop employees through the use of poor lighting and mid-1980s backgrounds. But guess what? That photographer is a double agent who's doing the same thing to Shaws, and also every supermarket you've ever been to.

In matters of national security, I call your attention to those Truvia sweetener ads, the ones with the cutesy singsong chick crooning that it "comes from a little green leaf." Top-secret communications reveal that this song was composed in North Korea, with help from Charles Manson and the girl from Scrubs who carried around the ukulele. Also, Truvia is made from the bones of dissidents.

There are so many juicy scandals and cover-ups that I have a hard time knowing what to release next. But check this out: I have leaks from realtors revealing their strategy for subverting owner-posted rental listings by bombarding the owners with obvious scams. I now understand why, when we listed our apartment on Craigslist, I immediately got a message from a guy named "Mack Johnson" who claimed to be in Ireland. I kept up an exchange with him just to see what he'd say, which led to the following awesome e-mail: "I have an uncle in the state that will handle the payment for me. And as for the Lease and application and form, i will have that best filled physically appending to signatories." Best filled physically appending to signatories? I thought that was just Irish English, until WikiLeaks pulled back the curtain on Real Estate Agents Maddening Average Shelter Sellers (REAMASS).

Although that doesn't explain why, when I listed a couch, my first enquiry was from someone named "Rage Grghghr" with an e-mail address that ended in .tv. Does that mean Rage Grghghr lives in my TV? And does anyone know how to send a cashier's check to the Sudan?

From what I understand, WikiLeaks is outraged that its compromised information has been compromised. That's why I've installed a "dead man's switch" on my computer that will release even more scandalous news should I disappear. What do bedbugs have in common with Syria, the corn industry and Kathie Lee Gifford? You'd better pray you never find out. ✖✖✖

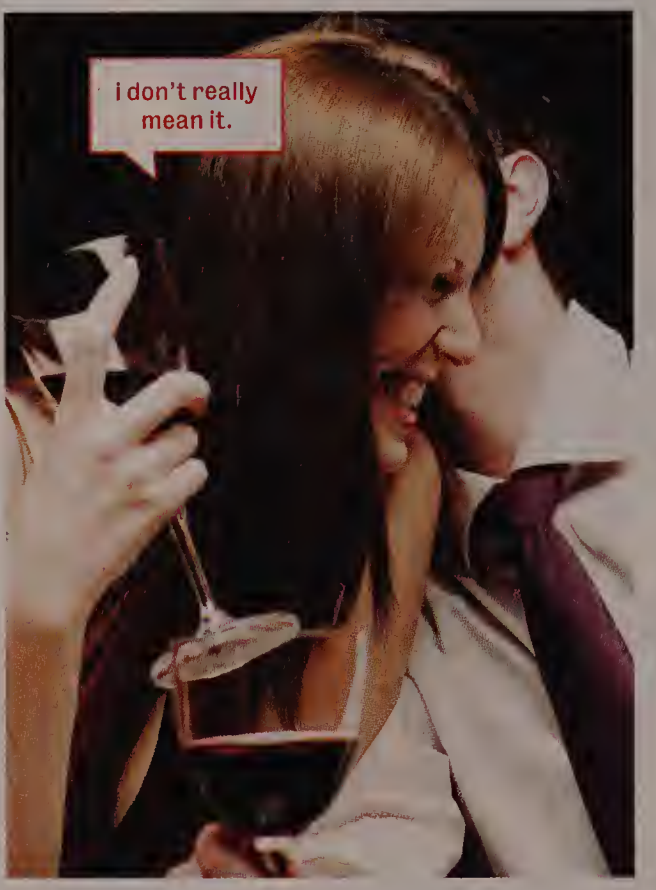
FLIRTS SO GOOD

Reflections on a beleaguered practice



FLIRTING HAS CHANGED over the years. Nowadays there are people who, if you flirt even a little in the workplace, will report you to human resources, or worse, to the dreaded compliance department. Long ago, working for a firm now gone, we had an annual audit, with several stern characters sent from New York to make sure our books were honest and our records pristine. Manny and Moe, the two auditors, would schlep into our office to see our manager, who was determined to have us come out with a clean bill of health. This manager would designate two female assistants, then called secretaries, to be escorts for Manny and Moe.

"Just flirt a little," the manager prompted. "Always lead them on, tease them with, 'I don't know you well enough,' or, 'We'll see next year.'" The manager would slip them each 20 bucks. We always passed the audit with flying colors.

It seems to me that flirting involves two kinds of people: those who hope the routine leads to something more serious, and those who never intend to take it anywhere. The latter want to play the game but are terrified of the consequences because they're married, or they simply love the journey but not the destination. I've interviewed more than a dozen women and the same number of men to determine that, in the flirting department, women are much more likely to do it for amusement. As one of them said, "I control the agenda. It's fun to tease and string them along, keep the journey going, the tension. But hold up the palm whenever it seems to be crossing the line." Another woman said, "I flirt, in a way, all the time, with parking attendants, doormen, bartenders, people who take care of us in so many ways. In a country with 300 million people, you better flirt to be taken care of."

In another office scenario I witnessed some time ago, an executive in our region, full of hot air and innuendo, would visit and do his best to flirt with a very attractive woman who ran operations. On every visit, he'd bring her the two age-old courting presents: flowers and candy. "Sweets for the sweet," he teased, and, "You smell like roses anyway." Our ops manager was flattered. They shared chocolate truffles in her office, feeding each other by hand. Tension between them built all that fall until the office Christmas party. The executive was there, smelling of Bay Rum—fresh haircut, new suit. Our ops manager was glowing as well—little black dress, pearls in place. No spouses were allowed at the party, partly to eliminate the awkwardness that spouses bring to that sort of fete, partly to give flirting free rein with the addition of free booze. Everything seemed jolly until the dancing began, with a DJ spinning disco tunes from the '70s. Suddenly, as one of Abba's songs filled our space, a scream sounded over the music. As was later reported by our ops woman, the executive whispered in her ear, "Time to cross the line." And then he bit that ear. Hard. The next voices the executive heard were from human resource people, advising him of his rights.

I have a friend I call "the Pro" because she uses subtle flirtation to get mileage out of people wherever she goes. She'll say things to guards in her building like, "Are you gonna be in the FBI next? I bet you will." Or to the man who fills the vending machines, "I bet you've never given free M&Ms to anyone. Even to a girl who thinks M&Ms are nature's perfect food." Or to a CEO she's pitching for her PR firm, "What were you like in high school? A hot shot?" The guard would escort her to her car at night. The vending guy would give her free M&Ms every week. The CEO gave her his business. But the key to her success, aside from a brilliant smile, is that she means it. It's not an act. The Pro claimed, "I guess I'm naturally flirtatious, but I love people's stories. And being interested in them makes them cough up the stories. Everyone wants to be noticed and appreciated. Don't you know that?"

"What if the guys take the flirting to mean more than you mean?"

The Pro thought about that for a while and said, with her killer smile, "Most of the time, I'll tell them to take a cold shower. Even if it cuts off the M&Ms."

Recently, I spent time with my two grandchildren, Alyssa and Wesley, both teenagers. I asked them about flirting in high school. Our grandson is thoughtful and will take his time with things. "Guys are immature," he said. "Our way of flirting is to do annoying things, outrageous things. Because we want attention. Act like jerks."

Our granddaughter, of course, dismissed this with an expression that implied, "What can we expect of boys?" Then she said, "We flirt to get our way. To find out from boys if other boys like us. Smiley faces when we text is flirting. So are winky faces on Facebook. Classes are boring, so we might as well flirt with boys. The girls know that flirting is a tool to make people jealous; to get things out of them."

"Any downside?" I asked.

They looked at each other, and both blurted out, "Kids flirt with teachers." Wesley said, "Older men flirting with younger girls is freaky."

Alyssa said in a falsetto, "Oh, I'm cute and clueless, and I need an extension on my paper."

I'm writing this column on a legal pad sitting at the bar in a Charles Street restaurant. A really cute waitress pauses for a minute. "I love your sweater," she says. "The colors." She rubs my shoulder. "It's fuzzy."

"Fuzzy is good," I answer.

She skips a beat. "Yes, it is."

Flirting is good, too. ✖✖✖

ON RAY, RASHEED, BELTRÉ AND BARD

OCHO SYNCO Marquis Daniels

Big Busted Three months in, and it's hard to imagine this season playing out truer to Jermaine O'Neal's lackluster reputation. At this point, it's even harder to imagine things getting any better. Obviously, there's still a lot of basketball left—and playoff performance is all that really matters—but O'Neal has come up short on every attempt to prove his worth, and his knee is about as reliable as an Antonio Cromartie child support check.

Call It a Comeback? Call me crazy, but I'm on board with a Celtics/Rasheed Wallace reunion. I assume the C's will only bring him back if they're sure his head's on straight, he's in shape and his presence won't piss anyone off. So given that they can find the roster space, why can't Sheed help for a few months? And it'll be so much easier once he's fitted with one of those new "three-point line" electric collars.

Quis Killing It Marquis Daniels' struggles never made much sense last season. I mean, he clearly wasn't right, but you could never figure out why. It just looked like he was on another planet (maybe visiting Ricky Davis on Mars?), and when the season ended, we all figured Daniels' Celtics career would, too. Well, thank Jeebus we were wrong. This year, Marquis is exactly who the C's need him to be. For the veteran minimum, at least.

Energizer Allen It's crazy to think that when the Big Three first came together, Ray Allen was the guy everyone worried about. He was the one with the injury history, the one they had to be careful with. The one whose body wouldn't hold up. Three and a half years later and that notion's funnier than the release on Luke Harangody's jumper. Ray's only missed five games since they won the championship, and he's now the one guy you can always count on to be there.

The Grind We've reached that familiar point in the Celtics season when priorities start to change. For a while the team was focused on the number one seed, but other factors—mainly injuries and the Heat—have shifted their priorities. Given the C's recent history, health is now far more important than home-court advantage. Buckle up, because it could get a little rocky, but it's all for the best—the C's are built for the long haul.

1 ONE PLAYOFF PREDICTION

I wrote this column before Pats vs. Jets, but I don't need to watch the game to know what's going to happen. Want me to prove it? Fine, the Pats won 31-13. Boom! OK, you can proceed to mock me now. (Unless I got it right. In which case, I AM YOUR MASTER!)

2 MAJOR BACK-UPS

The Large One... Glen Davis' latest run with the starting lineup wasn't always pretty. Or consistent. Or without Big Baby drama. But it once again proved that Davis is ready to play significant minutes for an extended period of time. The only problem is if another team is noticing as well. A team that has its checkbook ready next July...

It's Almost Time... The way this year started, you wondered if Tuukka Time might ever get a chance to shine. Tuukka essentially became the Bruins' Doug Mirabelli, a random spot start who jumped in when superhuman Tim Thomas needed a break. But now that Thomas has cooled a little and Rask is just getting warm, the tides are starting to turn. But, for at least one more year, Tuukka Time is the second option.

3 Front Office Notes

The Silver and Black Behind the iron curtain, I bet Bill Belichick's silently furious that the Raiders finished their season 8-8. Can you imagine if they'd sucked like they were supposed to and earned the Pats a top-10 pick to add to New England's already remarkable turnaround? That would've been Belichick Legend. One of his all-time great moves. Instead, we're just left to just sit around and wonder where they'll trade pick number 17.

The Knee By the time you read this, KG will hopefully be back on the floor, looking no worse for the wear, showing no limp, hesitation or any other telltale signs. That's the best-case scenario. But if that's not true, and he doesn't regain that early season edge, they need to bite the bullet and sit him back down. It's only January.

The Committee By my count, the Sox now have three legitimate closers on their roster. And I'm not just talking about guys who hypothetically could close. I'm talking about established guys. OK, maybe it's a little early on Daniel Bard, but between him, Papelbon and Jenks, that's a pretty formidable crew. Oh, and they just resigned Okey?! Well, I guess it can't all be good news.

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/19: One month from today, the Sox hold their first full Spring Training workout. It won't be the same without Adrián Beltré there to injure people.

1/21: Al Jefferson returns to Boston as a member of the Utah Jazz. Gerald Green returns as a member of the traveling trampoline halftime show.

1/25: Danny Woodhead turns 26 years adorable.

1/30: Decision time, folks. Celtics vs. Lakers, or the 2011 Pro Bowl? I'll give you a few seconds to think it over...

"I won't take crap

Soroff On MILAN LUCIC

The Bruins power forward talks about groupies, Bruce Willis movies and why he wouldn't fight Zdeno Chara.

BOSTON BRUINS LEFT WING MILAN LUCIC, 22, was born and raised in Vancouver, British Columbia. Now in his fourth season with the team, he attended Killarney Secondary before playing minor league hockey in his hometown. Lucic nearly quit the game after being passed over in the 2003 bantam draft, but was recruited by the Bruins at the age of 18 and currently leads the team in scoring. He was named to the NHL's YoungStars roster in 2008, and at the end of the season became just the 10th rookie in team history to win the Seventh Player Award. He lives in the North End.

Jonathan Soroff: How do you pronounce your name?
Milan Lucic: "Loo-cheech," like Cheech and Chong.

Is 17 your lucky number?
I was born on June 7, so I like to keep a 7 in my number. I was always 27, but when I came to the Bruins 27 was taken, so I went with 17.

Why are all hockey players such huge golfers?
Not all of them are. I've seen Zdeno Chara hit a ball, and he's not very good at it. But it's a challenging sport, and hockey players like challenges. It's also a similar motion to taking a hockey shot.

Do you have all your own teeth?
Yes, I do, thankfully and luckily.

Favorite karaoke song to perform?
It really depends on the crowd. But I'll probably go with "Beer for My Horses" by Toby Keith.

How good are you on the saxophone?
I was the lead alto in our concert band in high school. But I haven't played in six years.

Stan Getz, Charlie Parker or John Coltrane?
Coltrane.

Any game rituals you always perform?
I put my gear on the exact same way every time. I also like to tap my stick three times before I go on the ice every period.

Are you a gadget freak like your teammates?
No. Everyone on the team is except me.

Do you have a lot of groupies?
There are plenty around, but I have a girlfriend.

So what's the most annoying thing they do?
When they write their number down on a slip of paper and give it to you. Aggressive things like that are annoying.

Are you a good cook?
No, to be honest, but that's part of the reason I live in the North End.

Best-dressed Bruin?
Greg Campbell.

Player you idolize or try to emulate?
The guy I try to model my game after is Jarome Iginla, who plays for Calgary. He's a real good power forward who puts up a lot of points. He hits and he fights, and he's a great captain on his team. He's almost a perfect player in my eyes.

Is fighting an intrinsic part of hockey?
For me it is.

Do you consider yourself an enforcer?
I don't, but being a big guy, and growing up with two brothers, I had to fight. So I never shy away from it. I won't take crap from anybody.

Thing you miss most about Vancouver?
The guys I grew up with. I have a great group of friends I get to go home to in the summer. But there are a lot of similarities between Boston and Vancouver, with the water and all that.

Thing you like most about Boston?
It's a great city because of all the history. It's not every city where you get to see bricks that were there during the Revolution. It's also a great walking city, which is something I love to do. In the North End, I love hanging out at places like Caffé Vittoria or Dello Sport, having a coffee.

Think you'll ever be on Dancing With the Stars?
I would if they asked.

Movie or TV show that always makes you cry?
Armageddon with Bruce Willis and Ben Affleck.

Could you be a figure skater if you tried?
No. Anyone on the team will tell you that I'm not very good at skating backwards.

First thought you had when the Bruins drafted you?
It was a shock, because I had no idea they were interested in me. I knew nothing about the team or its history, other than Ray Bourque or Cam Neely. I just knew it was a good opportunity.

What are your thoughts on the website Milan Lucic's Girlfriend?
I absolutely hate it, because everything on there is false.

If you had quit hockey when you were passed over in the 2003 bantam draft, what would you be doing now?
Probably working with my dad and brother as a longshoreman at the Vancouver ports.

Any chance you'll get a college degree?
I would like to, but probably not.

Your reputation as a fighter: fair or unfair?
A little bit of both.

Anyone you'd never fight?
If I was playing against Chara I wouldn't. Because when he's mad, he's a big mean man.

Any nicknames?
People have been calling me "Looch" since I was 16, but there are some guys who call me Gino. They just thought I looked like a Gino.

Are there any gay players in the NHL?
Maybe one or two. I don't see how there could be, but I don't see how there couldn't.

Favorite reporter or sportscaster who covers the Bruins?
Kathryn Tappen. She's so nice every time I see her.

Thing you always do after a game?
I like to have a steam or a sauna. That's it for me. ×××

IN WINE, GEOGRAPHY IS FATE.

A LOOK AT OLD WORLD VS. NEW WORLD FLAVORS.

BY SANDY BLOCK, MASTER OF WINE
PHOTOGRAPHS BY DAVE BRADLEY

TALES OF TERROIR

LAST WEEK I FOUND MYSELF STAKED OUT AT A SEAFOOD RESTAURANT, WHERE I OVERHEARD THE FOLLOWING INTERCHANGE:

"This salmon you're serving, so where does it come from?"

"The ocean."

Unless you're exceptionally food-obsessed, do you have more than a passing idea about the origins of everything you eat? In contrast, with wine, the first question everyone asks is geographical: Where does this come from?

Region of origin once mattered more than it does today, back when the pursuit used to be all about pedigree. You know the ancient cliché: "That's not from Bordeaux? Well, I don't drink wine from California."

Happily, those days of ignorance and snobbery are over, but location still plays a huge role in wine selection for legitimate reasons. While we can source reasonably good wine from practically everywhere, the real question is one of style and flavor. Even in an age of globalization, wine will never be a homogenized product. The way it reflects vineyard origins is atavistic—there's always a throwback to soil, sun and grape variety. That's what makes wine so wonderfully confusing and diverse.

Grape varieties constitute the soul and personality of any wine. My feeling about them is heavily influenced by what I've learned observing Bill Belichick operate our New England Patriots over the years. How can a team maintain such consistent excellence in a game where the odds are stacked heavily against dynasties? By acquiring everyone's consensus All-American football stars? Or by searching out unknowns, discovering diamonds in the rough and placing them in the correct context so their abilities flourish? To enjoy wine most rewardingly, you have to learn to identify the overlooked sixth-round draft pick and maximize a grape's potential. That's how you achieve delicious harmony with food.

It's not about price. You can acquire critic-anointed, high-demand, "superstar" labels, the same wines everyone wants. Or you can create the right context for the less flashy unknowns, save some cash in the process and create a culinary winner. The trick is knowing where to look.

The first and most central question to ask: Is it European or not? With a disclaimer against gross generalizations, European, and particularly French, wines tend to be less overt in fruit flavor, lighter in body and more crisp. Non-European wines taste fuller on the palate, with riper, more boldly dramatic flavors. The difference is subtlety versus intensity; blending quietly into the background versus flamboyance.

Compare a random Napa chardonnay with a white Burgundy of the same price (or a New Zealand sauvignon blanc against a Sancerre from the Loire Valley, or a Russian River pinot noir versus a red Burgundy). What you'll most likely find is that one tastes richer and more vibrantly fruity, while the other comes across as delicate, understated and earthier, with tart, acidic, sometimes edgy flavors. Neither is better or worse. They're just suited to different food, or different palates.

The real trick is deciding which variety to match with which dishes. Let's say you've narrowed your choice and you're all about chardonnay with your fish. Which country do you look to for Friday dinner? The U.S., France, Australia, Chile or South Africa? There are exceptions, but what follows will stand you in good stead. If you're matching a subtle and understated dish, choose a European wine. If your meal is spicier, more heavily sauced and if there are fruits on the plate alongside the seafood, choose a non-European wine for its greater impact.

Here's my rundown on what to expect from the most common grape varieties, as well as from the main variations you're likely to find from the predominant styles—Old World versus New World.

CHARDONNAY

To belabor the sports metaphor, if there's a grape variety equivalent to Michael Jordan, Wayne Gretzky and Tom Brady all rolled into one, this is it. The ultimate winner that bucks all trends, it's one of the few grapes that's earned a household nickname ("I'll have a chard"). Locally, nationally, internationally (probably galactically), chardonnay consumption grows year after year, despite incurring the wrath of sommeliers everywhere. Why do we drink less and less white wine proportionately, but guzzle more and more chardonnay? It's a chameleon, equally at ease appearing in un-oaked and oak-aged forms, adaptable to cooler regions like Chablis, France, or Marlborough, New Zealand, as well as to hothouse vineyards in California and Australia. Here's a broad generalization: When the natural flavors of chicken or fish take center stage, drink chardonnay from Burgundy. They have mineral accents and green-apple scents. For jazzier dishes, go for the riper apple, sometimes tropically-accented, California examples. With lobster or crab, chardonnay is like the pat of butter. New World is full and rich (especially if aged in oak barrels); European is crisp, delicate and tangy.

PINOT GRIGIO/ PINOT GRIS

This is the second-most popular white grape, but it's even more loathed by the cognoscenti than chardonnay because it's not "complex." Pinot grigio from Italy, by far the predominant form you'll encounter, is mild, light, sometimes crisp and relatively easy drinking—a backdrop wine generally without vivid flavor focus. It's serviceable as an aperitif and with lighter casual fare, but if you're looking for that "wow" factor you might find it boring. Pinot gris from Oregon or California, on the other hand, is spicier and relatively fuller, with flashier apple and pear fruit.

SAUVIGNON BLANC

The number three white is all about citrus, acid and a long, lingering, sometimes bitter, finish. Unlike pinot grigio/gris, it flaunts extreme personality. Use it with food as you would a squeeze of fruit, to accent dishes whose flavors would benefit from a kick. Loire Valley sauvignon blanc (Sancerre or Pouilly-Fumé) is more mineral and silky with a lemony savor, while New Zealand versions taste more aggressively like grapefruit, although that's sometimes offset with barely perceptible sugar. California and Casablanca Valley, Chile, are also interesting sources, each less assertive than the Kiwis, with rounder textures.

RIESLING

Riesling still lags far behind the Big Three, although it's gaining popularity. It's relentlessly fruity but not always sweet, a matter of frequent confusion. Of the European classics, German rieslings tend to be lightest and most delicate, with floral, spring apple and apricot flavors, while Alsace, France, generally produces drier versions expressing pungent earthiness and a taste of baked apple and citrus. Rieslings excel with spicy dishes (Cajun, Asian, Latin), and also with plates incorporating fruit or other sweet ingredients. The finest New World versions hail from Australia's Clare Valley (lime-like, generally dry and fuller on the palate; use these much as you would a sauvignon blanc) and Marlborough, New Zealand (balanced precisely with sugar, fruit and acid, perhaps a wee bit fuller than the Germans).

PINOT NOIR

It's amazing to me how fashion hasn't killed this grape, as it has slain so many before it. Lighter in weight than the other reds, more aromatic, fruity and nuanced with fine acidity, pinot noir is a wine for which you generally have to pay. Value is relative, although Chile is a consistently fine source at the moderate end. Regarding style, refer to the chardonnay comments: the Burgundy region offers subtle fruit, mineral texture and higher acids. New World versions, especially Californian ones, taste fuller, with ripe cherry tones, and often an overlay of vanilla and spice from the oak. Pinot is the anytime wine with food. It won't overpower fish and is ideal for poultry or lighter meat dishes. Again, Burgundy is best for simpler flavors, while New World suits more complicated, assertive plates.

SYRAH/SHIRAZ

This one is fading fast in the market mainly because Australia, long the main source, is now focusing on wines that are thinner, sharper and less concentrated than they were in the past. Still, the peppery spice and concentrated raspberry fruit of this grape shouldn't be dismissed. France's Rhône Valley produces earthy, smoky, more tannic versions good with game, while the Aussies drive the berry flavors to the forefront. Unlike pinot, this grape is ultra-adaptable to all kinds of climate zones—making charming, food-flexible, fruit-forward wine from vineyards ranging from Chile and Argentina to California and South Africa.

MERLOT

Did you ever taste Château Pétrus? It's dark, handsome and has a perpetually smooth shave—all the reasons this now-maligned grape achieved fame in the first place. If you're looking for flamboyance, search elsewhere. True to form, European merlot (St. Émilion, Pomerol) is sharper, earthier and sleeker in style, while the U.S. and Chile are all about ripe, silky, easy-drinking fruit. Use the former with herb-accented lamb or beef roasted in its natural juice, the latter with spicier, more exotic, charcoal-grilled preparations.

CABERNET SAUVIGNON

This is the wine of full amplitude par excellence. With muscular tannins, currant-like perfume and fruit that's bold and mouth-filling, cabernet is the rare heavyweight that can also dance gracefully. California and Australia tend to do the richest, most concentrated versions, sometimes with chocolatey, jammy, lush black fruit to support the big tannins and massive alcohol. In Bordeaux, you'll encounter more tobacco and earth. So again, follow the same advice as for merlot.

THE U.S. AND CHILE ARE ALL ABOUT RIPE, SILKY, EASY-DRINKING BLACK FRUIT.

THE PREVIOUS VARIETIES cover a solid 80 percent of the market. Malbec, sangiovese, petite sirah and zinfandel are in-betweens—not popular enough to be standards and yet not unknown. The following wines, though, are relatively novel in this market, and are thus exponentially more satisfying to pour for friends who'll say, "Wow, this is delicious, I've never heard of that before." Here, then, are the conversation-starters.

CHENIN BLANC OLD AND NEW WORLDS

Like riesling, but fuller and earthier. It's hands-down the most disrespected great white wine available, especially the finer versions from France's Loire Valley. Honey, pear, earthy minerals, the ability to age almost infinitely, the versatility to be dry, just off dry or very sweet—it's got it all. South Africa doesn't do a bad job either, but its wines are lighter and simpler. For food, see riesling.

ALIGOTÉ OLD WORLD

Like chardonnay, but crisper and less rich in body. Burgundy's other white grape excels only when it hails from a few small obscure villages (try ones labeled "Bouzeron"). Bone dry, aligoté is aged on the yeast lees to produce creamy, tangy, lively wine that is stunningly good with crustaceans (especially mussels) or umami-laced dishes. Very little flash, but tres chic.

FALANGHINA OLD WORLD

Like chardonnay, but yeastier, with less oak (see page 12). This is a treasure from Campania, one of Italy's many well-kept secret grape varieties that are only grown in their native region. It has some of chardonnay's lushness, but less density and weight. There are intriguing herb scents in the better examples, and sometimes a slight vegetal edge. Very appetizing with risotto, polenta, white-sauced pasta and delicate fish fillets.

MUSCADET OLD WORLD

Like sauvignon blanc, but less extreme. From France's Atlantic coast, this is a crisp, slightly spritzy, bone-dry wine with a whiff of sea air and a touch of lemon. It's created for the sole purpose of making raw shellfish taste even better. Fresh, light, with a long lively finish.

MÜLLER-THURGAU OLD WORLD

Like riesling, but less fruity. Yes, it's a grape of German origin and riesling is one of its parents, but this variety produces wonderfully tasty wine in the hilly terrain of Trentino, in northern Italy. Good müller is dry, with fine-grained acids and stony citrus scents. Enjoy it like muscadet with fresh, unadorned fish.

PINOT BLANC OLD WORLD

Like pinot grigio, but rounder and spicier. Whether it hails from Alsace or northern Italy (as pinot bianco), this is super-adaptable with lighter fish dishes, featuring charming silky textures, a nice snap of acid and a twist of spice in the finish. Also fine as an aperitif all by itself.

TXAKOLI OLD WORLD

Like riesling, but less fruity with a touch of spritz. Technically speaking, this ultra-fresh, light, zesty Basque original is not really a grape variety, but if we said hondarribi zuri you'd never find it. Apple-like, low-key and crisp, it's refreshing with slightly salty dishes, salads and shellfish.

GRENACHE/GARNACHA OLD AND NEW WORLDS

Like pinot noir, but less tart and fuller. I'm in love with this grape. It's planted all over the world (Spain, southern France, Australia, California), and it's usually blended into some nondescript rosé or anonymous red wine. But when it's good, it's low in tannins (like pinot), warm and round, with layers of juicy cherry and spice. This is the ultimate ugly duckling transformed into a beautiful swan. Its fleshiness and adaptability with almost any food (particularly earthy meat or spicy fish stews) need to be better understood. It's pure cashmere.

CABERNET FRANC OLD WORLD

Like cabernet sauvignon, but less tannic. The best representations are from the Loire Valley, and then only in ripe vintages which produces raspberry-scented, herb-flavored, medium-bodied reds of pure, silky charm. It's amazing to me it's so little known. It goes with anything, particularly fish or fowl garnished with tomatoes and green herbs.

CARMÉNÈRE NEW WORLD

Like merlot, but more earthy and tart. It's only from Chile these days, and it's not for everyone (some find it too sharp and bitter), but this interesting grape holds a lot of opposites in tension: chocolate, plum, tea leaf, smoke and herbs. To me it's a flavor enhancer, adding excitement to virtually any meat dish. ×××

IN PRAISE OF BEER

A HEARTFELT PAEAN TO HUMANITY'S GREATEST ACHIEVEMENT

BY EZRA DYER
ILLUSTRATIONS BY ROXIE VIZCARRA

ACCORDING to Wikipedia, which is hardly ever wrong, beer is the third-most popular liquid in the hierarchy of human consumption, after water and tea. I'm not sure I believe that. It seems impossible that so many people could, on a daily basis, consume such a massive volume of tea. Maybe in England. Over here in the colonies, I'll bet it goes water first, beer second, tea one millionth. In fact, if ye olde King of England taxed beer → like he did tea back in the day, the American Revolution would've happened about a month after the Mayflower bumbled into harbor.

Speaking of which, did you know that beer helped force the Pilgrims to stop screwing around and drop anchor at Plymouth? According to the diary of William Bradford, "We could not now take time for further search or consideration, our victuals being much spent, especially our beer." Especially our beer.

Beer, you see, inspires devotion like no other beverage. Sure, you've got your oenophiles and your bourbon snobs. And you've got your cultural alcoholic staples—sake in Japan, vodka in Russia, Scotch in Scotland. But ask the most Smirnoff-soaked Russkie which he'd rather give up, beer or vodka, and I guarantee he'd trade all the hard stuff in the world for a steady supply of frosty beer. You know how Inuits have a ton of words for snow? Germans are like that with beer. And if they're not, they should be.

Beer is the most casual of drinks, the most versatile of tipples. "Beer has no airs," says Al Marzi, VP of brewing operations at Harpoon. And he's right. It's as appropriate on a beach as it is with a fancy dinner. Sam Adams has devised a beer, Infinium, for the express purpose of toasting fancy occasions. Beer can handle whatever mission you throw at it, up to and including presidential diplomacy. That meeting between Obama, the Cambridge cop and Henry Louis Gates Jr.? It wasn't called the Diet Snapple Summit (Obama drank Bud Light, Gates Sam Adams Light, the cop had Blue Moon). Moreover, when George Thorogood wants a beverage to wash down one bourbon and one Scotch, he does not ask for one chardonnay. And what's the most-used app on my particular phone? iBeer. Which allows you to virtually drink a beer. The future has arrived.

Right now you may be asking, "Which beer is right for me?" That's a question only you can answer. I ask Marzi to name his favorite beer, and he replies, "The one that's in front of me." Jon Cadoux, founder of Peak Organic Brewery, points out that in New England we enjoy an embarrassment of riches in our beer choices, a bounty of liquid wonder. "The cool thing about living in New England," he says, "is that there are so many beers that you can literally never drink everything. You think you've covered most of what's out there, but then the next time you go to the shelves, there are 10 new things." If you want to interpret that assessment as a challenge, feel free.

Beer shapes our life experiences. In the case of my friend Kerry, a writer who specializes in the holy trifecta of beer, food and football, beer helped him get married (and have many other adventures—see sidebar). "I met my wife because her dad owned a brewery that I was writing about," he says. "Her dad and I hit it off, and I'd call him regularly for a column I wrote about New England breweries. One time her dad invited me to a cool pub in Rhode Island that carried his beer: Aidan's Pub in Bristol. I went to meet him... with my girlfriend at the time. He happened to bring his daughters. My girlfriend and I broke up soon after that, and the rest, as they say, is history."

My own history with beer doesn't feature anything as major as suds-derived matrimony, but my photo albums are studded with fond memories. Like the time I was climbing the Great Wall of China with my wife and her parents, and it was 90 degrees, the air thick with suffocating humidity. Tired, sweating, we rounded a corner to discover what looked like an oasis: a guy selling beer right on top of the Great Wall. Praise capitalism! That turned out to be one of the most refreshing beers of all time. (As an aside, I don't believe the womenfolk bought beers, as the consumption of beer-as-sports-drink seems to be a distinctly male strategy somehow related to yard work.)

I've had beer from a vending machine in Japan, atop a dune in Namibia, on a train in India. I've funneled beer with Spam and mayonnaise in it, two flavoring agents that I advise against. Formula One/NASCAR driver Juan Pablo Montoya once poured me a beer. When they made the toast at my wedding, guests raised

During my senior year of college, my flight to a sunny spring break destination was scheduled on a Sunday. Key word: "scheduled"—the airline stranded us the first night and put us up at a hotel in Revere. Which meant that we couldn't get the party started unless we wanted to go sit in the nearest T.G.I. Friday's. Luckily, my parents came to the rescue, driving to New Hampshire and then delivering us the social lubricant that would allow spring break to start on time (albeit in a decrepit hotel in Revere). It was a Christmas miracle, a few months late.

GOLF WOULD BE INTOLERABLE WITHOUT BEER.

Beer makes people attractive and makes you feel strong. The sport of golf would be intolerable without beer. That goes double for fishing. On one fishing trip last summer, I asked my brother-in-law, Rick, whether he'd brought beer. To which he replied, "What do I look like, I don't know how to fish?"

Beer helps your memory. Or at least it can serve as a device to help you remember something as inane as a PIN number. A few years ago, I was at the Sam Adams Brewery in Jamaica Plain for the introduction of Sam Light. Across the table from me sat Jim Koch, cofounder of the company. Somehow we got to talking about ATM cards, and I told him, "I never forget my PIN number, because it spells 'beer'—2337." Koch happily replied, "That's mine too!" Hopefully he's changed that by now.

As Peak's Cadoux points out, there's an endless variety of interesting beers. Harpoon brews small batches of esoteric flavors in its "100 Barrel" series. "Some of those—like a wheat beer we brewed with honey—I thought would never sell," Marzi says. "But it ended up flying off the shelf." Which demonstrates that even weird beer will be embraced, lovingly, by some segment of the population.

There are sometimes bad outcomes as a result of beer. Beer was responsible for the loss of my first wedding ring. At Ballard's bar on Block Island they'll bring a bucket of beer right to your towel on the beach. After a few refreshments, you might feel the urge to cool off with a swim. But the consumption of said beach beer will cause you to forget that your fingers shrink a little when you're swimming. And that's how your wedding band ends up in hock at the King Nautilus pawnshop. I blame that one entirely on beer.

But I can't stay mad. Over the years my tastes have changed, trending toward less Natty Light and more Cisco Whale's Tale Pale Ale, but my underlying affinity toward beer remains the same. As Cadoux puts it, "You meet some people who say they get sick of drinking beer. But I never, ever do." ✖✖✖

A LIFE WELL-LIVED

Kerry J. Byrne, beer and food writer for The Boston Herald and the founder of Coldhardfootballfacts.com, is working on a TV project called "The Beer Traveler." This tells you pretty much all you need to know. Below are his favorite memories from globe-trotting in pursuit of the Platonic pint.

ZURICH, SWITZERLAND
My buddy Mike and I went to the local schiesskeller ("shooting cellar") and, in our primitive German, rented a Glock 9MM pistol. The door to the shooting range was next to the bar. We emptied the clip, came back to the bar and got buzzed on Hürlimann Lager. We got friendly enough with the bartender that he lent us his own Swiss Army rifle and 20 rounds on the house. If you're wondering, the schiesskeller had a play area for children.

REGENSBURG, GERMANY
I met one of the cofounders of Sam Adams while he was hop-shopping in Bavaria, and I went to dinner that night with his crew at a pig farm. They served about 50 kinds of pork on a sliver of tree trunk. Bavarian lager, too. The rest is a fog. When I woke up the next morning, I asked the perplexed hotel clerk what city I was in (Regensburg, it turns out).

LONDON, ENGLAND
I know a guy who's a friend of a British MP. He took us past empty kegs in a cobblestone alley to a pub deep inside the bowels of Parliament called the Hop Inn. We drank hand-drawn pints of Fuller's London Pride and met an old Scotsman named Angus who invaded Normandy on D-Day. On a related note...

BERCHTESGADEN, GERMANY
Hitler's "Eagle's Nest" above Berchtesgaden is now a beer hall owned by the State of Bavaria. We sat at a table on the edge of an Alpine precipice drinking golden Hofbräu Lager. Stunning views. But it was unsettling to drink on the same spot where Hitler lorded over the Final Solution.

PARIS, FRANCE
Randomly made friends with a group of Mexicans and a mother and daughter from Bermuda last year at a cafe in Montmartre. We all agreed to meet underneath the Eiffel Tower later for the midnight light show. Everybody brought wine and Champagne. Pas moi, mon ami! I toasted Paris with a couple of Bud tallboys.

MERITAGE TRAIL

WHEN CHEF DANIEL Bruce of Meritage at the Boston Harbor Hotel launched the 22nd Boston Wine Festival a few weeks ago, he popped the cork on the city's annual bacchanal. Running through April 1, Bruce's series of wine dinners and tastings is the longest-running of its kind in the country. A more abbreviated affair begins Jan. 22 when the Boston Wine Expo returns to the waterfront. Seminars on pairings, varieties and wine lingo add an educational element to the two-day event, while chefs like Todd English, Ming Tsai and Michael Schlow stir up the crowd with culinary demonstrations. But the real draw, of course, is the opportunity to sip more than 1,500 wines crafted by more than 300 wineries.

MATT NANNIS

Boston Wine Festival runs through April 1, $75–$330, at the Boston Harbor Hotel, Boston (888-660-9463) bostonwinefestival.net.

Boston Wine Expo runs Jan. 22–23, 12:30–6 pm, $85–$175, at the Seaport World Trade Center, Boston (877-946-3976) wineexpoboston.com.

The Height of Imagination

Freudian Flips No lion tamers or clown-crammed cars at this circus. Things unfold in a shrink's office, but you're quickly swept off the couch. Watch as the voices in the mind of a young man lead him through the muck and mire of his own uncertainties, toward amazing feats of strength and accomplishment. The 7 Fingers' PSY bears similarities to Cirque du Soleil with its incredible stunts and humor, but it thankfully lacks the heavy marketing. Flip for it at the Cutler Majestic Theatre, Jan. 25-30. Matt Nannis

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Blue Valentine ★★★★ The ghost of John Cassavetes looms large over writer/director Derek Cianfrance's second feature. Blue Valentine is a vicious little number, charting the courtship and dissolution of a marriage, often in alternating scenes. Whiplashing from the dizzying heights of adolescent infatuation back to middle-age sadness, the movie somehow captures both the euphoria of attraction and the hellish claustrophobia of a failed relationship. It's exasperating, infuriating and something very special. Ryan Gosling stars as Dean, a swaggering bad-boy who likes to drink beer for breakfast but really has a heart of gold. The only person in the world who sees this is Michelle Williams' Cindy, a local girl who's been around the block a few times. The connection between Dean and Cindy is at first electric, then deadening. Though sometimes too schematic in its construction, the movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam until there's nothing left but hurt. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square, West Newton Cinema and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★ Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of J.K. Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins midspeech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

How Do You Know ★★ Floundering and weird in ways that few contemporary romantic comedies can emulate, writer/director James L. Brooks' already legendary box-office bomb cost somewhere around $120 million, despite containing not a single distinctive visual image. Reese Witherspoon stars as an uptight Olympic softball player torn between the affections of Owen Wilson's dopey Washington Nationals relief pitcher and Paul Rudd's soon-to-be-indicted CEO. Rom-com shenanigans ensue, but in a strangely unpredictable fashion that's either genre-busting or just plain clueless. Jack Nicholson hams it up to depressingly little effect as Rudd's cheerfully corrupt father while scenes meander hither and yon, breaking up tried-and-true formulas and chasing their own tails. The brilliant Rudd escapes unscathed, throwing himself into the role with reckless abandon. Witherspoon and Wilson fare poorly, however, playing retread Xeroxes of familiar parts, fumbling around directionless in way too many go-nowhere scenes in search of a story. Didn't anybody actually write this out before they started filming? (In the suburbs.)

I Love You Phillip Morris ★ ½ Shelved since its Sundance premiere almost two years ago, the self-satisfied directorial debut of Bad Santa screenwriters Glenn Ficarra and John Requa stars Jim Carrey in the true story of conman Steven Jay Russell. A habitual jail-breaker, Russell routinely defrauded and eluded creditors and captors in a rather ingenious white-collar crime spree. He was also a homosexual, which the filmmakers have decided is not just the only interesting thing about his story, but also the end-all-be-all of

MEN AT WORK

It's hard to feel bad for The Company Men, bad accents excluded.

The Company Men ★★
Starring Ben Affleck, Tommy Lee Jones, Chris Cooper, Rosemarie DeWitt, Maria Bello and Kevin Costner. Written and directed by John Wells. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

SHOT LOCALLY BACK IN February of 2009, acclaimed TV director John Wells' feature debut has taken its sweet time getting to the multiplexes. It's easy to see why. With around 10 percent of the country out of work, the amount of sympathy you'll be able to generate for downsized rich dudes probably depends on your own financial circumstances. It's tough to feel torn up about Ben Affleck having to sell his Porsche when most of us are hustling to make rent at the end of every month.

Affleck stars as Bobby Walker, hotshot salesman at a fictional Massachusetts company called GTX. Founded as a lone shipyard in Gloucester run by two best friends (Craig T. Nelson and Tommy Lee Jones), GTX has grown into a multimillion-dollar operation, suddenly cutting personnel like crazy to keep the shareholders happy in this troubled economic climate.

Jones' Gene McClary is the saintly, clear-eyed pragmatist, watching helplessly as his life's work is stripped for parts by corporate paper pushers. Nelson's James Salinger is the villainous CEO, singularly focused on ramping up the stock price to make GTX more attractive to potential buyers, and aching to cash out and retire.

Bobby is one of the first let go, and The Company Men doesn't stint on the humiliations that ensue. Sent packing by an ice-queen HR automaton (Maria Bello), he spends a fair chunk of the picture in increasingly frantic denial. Insisting on preserving the illusion of success, Bobby keeps the sports car, the steak dinners and the country club membership, refusing to even entertain the idea of moving somewhere more reasonable than a suburban mansion. Affleck excels at playing callow, his boorishness put to the test by the cheesy self-help slogans of outplacement seminars.

Wells is revered in television, having been the showrunner for ER, then resuscitating The West Wing after the departure of creator Aaron Sorkin. Despite the contributions of brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins, The Company Men has a distinctly small-screen sensibility, often feeling like an entire season of one of Wells' polished dramas whittled down to feature length.

It also feels inauthentic, a combination of talking points and statistics missing the grace notes of real-life experience. Bobby's fall is absurdly diagrammed, with the former master of the universe forced to move his family back into his parents' house (couldn't they have just rented an apartment?) and take a charity job hanging drywall with his surly, salt-of-the-earth brother-in-law, played by Kevin Costner.

Even worse is the plight of Chris Cooper's Phil Woodward, a 30-year GTX vet who comes unhinged after being shown the exit door. It's here Wells all but plagiarizes entire scenes from Fernando León de Aranoa's marvelous 2002 film, Mondays in the Sun, which starred Javier Bardem as a pugnacious alpha dog in a group of recently unemployed shipyard workers. The comparison between the two films is instructive, as Mondays coursed with grit and vinegar, whereas The Company Men is glossy and resigned.

Adding to the ersatz pallor is Hollywood's recent, unfortunate affinity for terrible Boston accents. In the equivalent to an English drawing room drama spoken in Cockney slang, The Company Men's moneyed, white-collar MBA's all drop their R's and bellow profanity like they're auditioning for the sequel to The Departed. Does the movie really think that people living in Wellesley mansions sound like extras from The Fighter? This also gives Costner another chance to prove for the umpteenth time that he has no business doing accents, ever.

But Tommy Lee Jones, bless his heart, just talks like Tommy Lee Jones. Deftly underplaying and speaking volumes with his silence, his Gene McClary hovers over the film with sad-eyed grace, wondering where it all went so wrong. Unfortunately, most of Jones' performance seems to have been left on the cutting-room floor. He's having an affair with Bello's HR tyrant, and at one point even leaves his wife for her. The illicit couple is living together in one scene yet estranged minutes later, with no explanation.

Even the McClary character becomes problematic in The Company Men's final reel. For a movie purporting to explore the bitter realities of unemployment, the disingenuous conclusion undercuts any lessons learned. Most folks today aren't as fortunate as any of these men, and most of us never had Porsches to sell in the first place. ✖✖✖ modern comedy. Carrey, a needy performer at his most manic and pleading, vamps it up with Ewan McGregor's absurdly naïve Southern belle, and both graphically swap spit (among other things) in one confrontational close-up after another. Downplaying the tale's more intriguing elements in favor of vulgarity and shock value, Ficarra and Requa apparently suffer under the delusion that there's nothing more scandalous than the sight of boys kissing. Get over it, guys. (At Coolidge Corner.)

Inside Job ★★★ ½ Charles Ferguson—who helmed the extraordinary Iraq documentary No End in Sight—turns his attention to the 2008 economic meltdown. The results are harrowing, infuriating and laced with a surprising strain of gallows humor. Narrated by Matt Damon, Inside Job provides an invaluable guide to credit default swaps and collateralized debt obligations, making Wall Street jargon accessible to even a numerically challenged lunkhead like yours truly. It's hard not to get your ire up watching these exorbitantly compensated robber barons fleecing pension funds with falsely rated junk investments. Ferguson has a gift for clarity, explaining derivatives in ways that flummoxed Michael Moore in last year's dismal Capitalism: A Love Story. Cathartic but less successful is a sequence in which the filmmaker questions a few econ wizards. It's fun to watch them squirm but feels cheap in comparison to the rest of the picture's razor-sharp outrage and simplicity. Everybody who's in some money trouble should see this film. So I guess that means just about everybody should see this film. (At the Somerville Theatre and West Newton.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Love and Other Drugs ★★ ½ By turns a raunchy bedroom farce, a health-care industry satire, a chick flick and a '90s nostalgia piece, watching Love and Other Drugs sometimes feels like channel surfing. Jake Gyllenhaal's callow, studly drug rep meets his match in Anne Hathaway's brassy Bohemian artist, who shares his hobby of casual fornication. Despite the best efforts of both parties, they soon find themselves in (gasp!) a relationship. Things get tricky, as she suffers from early onset Parkinson's. Thanks to Hathaway's marvelous performance, we see a young woman always on her guard, determined to shield herself from any attachments, as they'll inevitably end in heartbreak. It's a gutsy turn with some surprisingly sharp edges. But the sharper Hathaway gets, the gummier the movie becomes. Gyllenhaal is Hollywood's luckiest actor, and not just because his job entails rolling around with a naked Anne Hathaway. Has such a modestly talented actor ever been so consistently outmatched onscreen? (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

Rabbit Hole ★★★★ Grief is so much messier and confusing than most movies allow. The miracle of this small, revealing and surprisingly funny gem from director John Cameron Mitchell is that the story begins long after most pictures would've rolled the credits. It's been nine months since a suburban couple (strikingly well-played by Nicole Kidman and Aaron Eckhart) lost their four-year-old son in a car accident. Based on an off-Broadway play by David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole is primarily concerned with questions about moving on, how soon is too soon and can things ever go back to any semblance of normal? As evidenced in his Hedwig and the Angry Inch and triumphant Shortbus, Mitchell is a filmmaker who genuinely likes people, a much scarcer trait than you might imagine. Deeply compassionate and attuned to the odd, amusing moments that sometimes erupt during emotional anguish, Rabbit Hole feels awkward and real, accepting that there are no easy answers. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

Season of the Witch ★ ½ Not even one of those so-bad-it's-fun Nicolas Cage movies, this film is so bad it's just boring. Cage stars as a knight of the Crusades who suddenly decides he's tired of killing. Ensnared by the church into transporting a witch to trial, he and partner Ron Pearlman spend an ungodly amount of time on an arduous journey through a poorly lit forest, getting their minds messed with by this feral woman (Claire Foy). There's a whiff of scholarship in the early

Adam Taylor

Easy Rider

Tramp of Approval High schoolers everywhere have flipped through the pages of The Scarlet Letter (or, more likely, read the CliffsNotes). Easy A, a surprise hit last fall, updates Hester Prynne's story for the sexting generation. The film follows the fabricated sex scandals of Olive Penderghast (played by an endearing Emma Stone), who cooks up salacious rumors to help her male classmates shed their "loner" and "loser" labels. As her flawless reputation goes to hell, the film employs some thematic clichés and piles on a few too many John Hughes references. But it ultimately succeeds in channeling relatable adolescent angst. Easy A plays at the Brattle Theatre on Jan. 28.

Hilary White

parts of Bragi F. Schut's screenplay, hopping mad at the way allegations of witchcraft were routinely used by power-hungry religious figures to persecute freethinking women. But this isn't The Crucible, it's a stupid action movie. All the possible allegories quickly take a backseat to a silly CGI demon trying to get his claws on a missing chapter of the Bible. Cage phones it in, leaving aside his patented over-the-top affectations to let his hair extensions do the acting for him. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

Somewhere ★★ Nobody does ennui like Sofia Coppola. Amid her plush, often absurdly luxurious hotel-scapes lurks a deep-seated unease. All the soft-focus photography and designer fashions can't disguise the gnawing loneliness that haunts her characters as they sleepwalk through empty lives. Sadly, after only four films this is starting to feel a little routine. Wandering around for a few days with a hollowed-out action-movie hero (Stephen Dorff) as he chases skirts, glad-hands reporters and barely connects with his estranged daughter (Elle Fanning), Somewhere feels like a regurgitation of Coppola's greatest hits. There's a wonderful sense of isolation and little else. Dorff falls asleep at strip shows, avoids his exes and can't quite muster up any understanding of his child's needs. Falling back on that gorgeous atmosphere, Coppola's movie ends up as stunted as its protagonist. This is the first 10 minutes of Lost in Translation stretched out for two hours, and Stephen Dorff is no Bill Murray. (At Kendall Square.)

Tron: Legacy ★★ Visually dazzling and otherwise inert, the sequel nobody asked for to a 29-year-old movie nobody liked displays all the perils of blockbuster franchise filmmaking with very few of the pleasures. Charisma-free Garrett Hedlund stars as the son of Jeff Bridges' legendary computer hacker, who enters the neon-drenched "grid" to rescue his long-lost dad. The kitschy charm of the original Tron was its vision of life inside computers, a perpetual video game with vaguely prophetic hints at the cyberworld to come. But Tron: Legacy is too busy setting up sequels and spin-offs to even bother addressing the Internet. It's all expository gobbledygook, devoid of personality or pep. Bridges amusingly riffs on his "Dude" persona, but his computer-generated counterpart, a de-aged villain named Clu, is a shoddy special effect. Best to kick back and enjoy the subtle, unobtrusive 3-D and director Joseph Kosinski's startling widescreen compositions, which offer deft arrangements of horizontal and vertical lines within the frame. Lovely eye candy, the rest is gibberish. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her Pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured, absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Unstoppable ★★★ Director Tony Scott's fifth collaboration with Denzel Washington is a slick, efficient machine without a single thought in its head besides keeping you entertained for 98 minutes. Based on actual events presumably exaggerated out of all conceivable proportion, the film follows a runaway freight train roaring through rural Pennsylvania. To sweeten the deal, this particular choo-choo happens to be laden with hazardous chemicals, prompting Rosario Dawson's railroad manager to describe it as "a missile the size of the Chrysler building!" Lucky for us, a couple hundred miles down the line we've got a grizzled conductor (Denzel Washington) and his rookie partner (Chris Pine) on what was supposed to be a routine assignment. What makes this film such fun is that there's no villain, just a one-thing-after-another series of logistical problems. Unstoppable's clean narrative lines lock Scott into a scenario where his usual restless camera style can't shake the production, even though the guy apparently has never found a scene that he couldn't shoot from a swooping helicopter. (In the suburbs.)

Music {PAUL ROBICHEAU}

DUE COURSE

Lissie plays the Paradise on Jan. 29.

Patience and ingenuity pay off in Lissie's pop-world travels.

Elaine Constatine

SOME PERFORMERS LOOK back at their childhood stage experience as something cute or prophetic. For Elisabeth Maurus, known better as folk-pop upstart Lissie, her title role in the musical Annie at age nine provides her with resonance and inner guidance.

"I always relate to her as a character, and think how sweet it was that I got to play [her] when I was young," says Maurus, 28. "In times of struggle and people trying to bring her down, she had so much hope, and that's what I try to embody in my life."

It's been a winding road for the freckly blonde who bounced from small-town Illinois to Colorado, Paris and Hollywood by age 21. She's finally found a groove with her beguiling debut album, Catching a Tiger, as well as popular covers of Lady Gaga, Kid Cudi and Metallica.

"I didn't understand how viral YouTube things really went," says Maurus, whose live take on Gaga's "Bad Romance" sparked nearly 2 million views. "So I didn't know it would get that reaction." Of her diverse song selections, she adds, "Each one of my covers has really come from a genuine moment of 'I really like this song,'" noting that she discovered Kid Cudi's "Pursuit of Happiness" while driving with a friend around Rock Island, Ill. That's where Maurus was raised on country, hip-hop, rock and show tunes, listening to Willie Nelson, Snoop Dogg and Phish as well as Sarah McLachlan and Fiona Apple. The youngest of four children, she also was inspired by her grandfather, a champion barbershop-quartet singer. "All that [music] subconsciously gets into your taste," says Maurus, who plays the Paradise Rock Club on Jan. 29.

"I was into taking the front of the stage and singing louder than anyone else, and I had this sort of big, husky, belting voice from a young age." Not that her booming personality helped in high school. The story goes that Maurus was expelled after a run-in with a teacher, but she downplays the event. "I had a lot of teachers who were hell-bent on putting me in my place," she says. "I would talk back, and I still have that in me.... I've got gumption, and I stick up for what I believe in."

During a stint at Colorado State University, Maurus performed on DJ Harry's heavily licensed "All My Life," heard on the TV shows Veronica Mars, House and The O.C. And after a semester in Paris, she headed to L.A. to try a music career.

> "I've got gumption, and I stick up for what I believe in."

Her early years in L.A. were a slow study in dichotomy. Maurus sold honey at a farmers' market and worked at Urban Outfitters while playing club gigs and scoring sporadic coups. She opened for Lenny Kravitz after he heard her on MySpace and was briefly signed to Madonna's Maverick label. Maurus was invited to sing at a few celebrity parties, including a gig at a secret location that turned out to be Demi Moore and Ashton Kutcher's wedding.

"I wasn't nervous because I know I can sing, but the socializing part I was a bit uncomfortable with," she says. "[The wedding] didn't do a lot for my career, but it's an interesting story."

Frustrated with the big city and mulling the end of a long-term relationship, Maurus moved to Ojai, a quiet mountain town north of L.A. "It saved me from a hard time and pulled me out of a funk," she says. "I got my confidence back."

Maurus channeled her experiences into Catching a Tiger while shifting through various styles and producers. She recorded four tracks with producer Bill Reynolds from Band of Horses, using "Bully" ("Your heart's been broken, but martyrs never open doors") and the wistful "Everywhere I Go" as pipelines to her emotional turnaround.

Kings of Leon producer Jacquire King steered more commercial opening tunes, including the Fleetwood Mac–evoking "In Sleep." And Ed Harcourt cowrote and produced "Oh Mississippi," a gospel piano ballad that Maurus nailed in stark form on the British TV showcase Later... With Jools Holland, sealing UK acclaim.

But it's all Lissie. "I'm not covering my face with 10 pounds of makeup or showing up in some strange costume," she says from her Ojai home. "Of course I want to learn new things, and I'm adaptable. I'm not going to rule anything out. But I really can't fake it." ×××

Greg Delman

Potted Plant

Rock Roots Alongside his bandmates in Led Zeppelin, Robert Plant is a true, dyed-in-the-wool rock god. Still framed in head-banging curls, he's managing to warp time by performing new music that transports audiences to the past. With the help of his Band of Joy, Plant's unmistakeable vocals evoke the eclectic vibe of Zeppelin (not to mention the soundtrack of countless teenage basement parties). He's at the House of Blues on Jan. 25.

Dye Hard

Strong Coffey

Hairstylist Tabatha Coffey has built her reputation on having a no-nonsense attitude and a tongue sharper than new shears. Watched by millions on Tabatha's Salon Takeover, Coffey has turned around some of America's seediest salons, and caused plenty of tears along the way. Her brazen bites are backed by years of success, and she's sharing career and life lessons from her memoir, It's Not Really About the Hair, when she stops by Brookline Booksmith on Jan. 28. Kyle Wright

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you went. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Ali Cashman has expensive taste. For the holidays, she asked for one of everything in our Holiday Shopping guide, as well as a getaway fit for the Queen.

Justin Clark, Monica Drozd, Nicole Cushion and Joe Guilmartin hit the slopes in Whistler, British Columbia, known for its population of black bears. No snow bunnies were harmed during the taking of this picture.

Aban Makarechian kicked off her New Year's resolution by swapping her StairMaster for the Great Wall of China. Moo shu pork is no match for the ancient Chinese art of low-impact cardio.

Souren and Lisa Maserejian were mystified by what they saw at Iguazu Falls, on the border between Brazil and Argentina. Correction: They were just misted.

IN GOOD STEED

High Ho, Silver!

There's nothing a thoroughbred appreciates more than another thoroughbred, which explains why the blue-blooded horsey set was out in full force for the cocktail party at Jacob Wirth to benefit the Friends of the Boston Park Rangers Mounted Unit.

Helping to ensure that Boston's green spaces will continue to be patrolled by guys resembling Dudley Do-Right were such prominent animal lovers as philanthropic fun-couple Cokie and Lee Perry, Beacon Hill doyenne Biddy Owens and the dapper Bob, equestrian stud muffins Tony Corey and CJ Menard, the blonde triumvirate of Laura Baldini, Alexandra Dowling and Julia Owens, latter-day Diana Vreeland Tonya Contos, Cambridge homey Charley (Curly) Aldrich, Mandarin Oriental marvel Edwina Kluender, Turkish delight Handan Titiz, salty sailor Sinan Kunt and Chestnut Hill chatelaine Gale Minot, with her pretty and pedigreed goddaughter, Nina Coolidge (celebrating her 25th birthday).

The cozy crowd gathered in a corner of the restaurant to sip adult beverages, and the buffet boldly included sausages on sticks. Needless to say, there was no shortage of witty repartee. To wit:

"If Alexander McQueen being dead is your worst problem, you're doing OK."

"Sorry for spilling. I was attacked by a Chanel bag."

And my personal favorite:

"If it weren't for the shakes, I wouldn't get any exercise at all."

Brother, Can You Spare a 20?

If the term "coming out" means anything to you besides the announcement that someone's gay, you should've been at The Boston Park Plaza for the Boston Cotillion: the annual presentation of the season's debutantes.

Like swans swathed in white ballgowns, the young misses of 2010 included Constance (Coco) Gardner Minot of Boston, Sarah Elizabeth Dale of Weston, Stephanie Katharine Moroney of Manchester by the Sea, Kathryn Carr Whitelaw of Weston, Katherine Winslow L'Heureux of Dover, Mary Livingston Kinsella of Dover, and sisters Amelia Marie, Francesca Cabot and Olivia Paine Metcalf of Newton.

Needless to say, Stephen Cabot Metcalf was the hardest-working dad in deb-land that night (not to mention the most out-of-pocket). Other proud parents included the youthfully dewy Lynn Pantano Dale, the eternally attractive Gale Minot and accomplished equestrienne Mary Chilton Crane, while those on hand to witness the proceedings included the lovely likes of Lucy and Nina Coolidge, Amory and Hilary Minot, Blake Whitney and Susan Hunnewell.

Charley Aldrich, Alex Dowling and Julia Owens at Jacob Wirth

Tone Corey and CJ Menard at Jacob Wirth

Coco Minot and Nina and Lucy Coolidge at the Cotillion

A debutante going down the receiving line at the Cotillion

Liza Winship and Molly Storer at the Winter Ball

Juan Uribe and Lacy and Jack Roosevelt at the Winter Ball

Watching the formal introduction to society was like witnessing a John Singer Sargent painting or an Edith Wharton short story come to life. Each girl was accompanied by two escorts and presented by a male relative, and after curtsying beneath an arbor of evergreens, she proceeded down a receiving line of prominent females.

One major bummer: Due to bad weather, one of the debs didn't make it home from London in time. The other major bummer: As one guest pointed out: "This is a Wasp party. Of course it's a cash bar."

I Could've Danced All Night

The Winter Ball, meanwhile, also held at The Boston Park Plaza (and on the same night as the Cotillion), was more like a scene out of F. Scott Fitzgerald.

The black-tie shindig serves as an annual reunion of sorts for people who only see each other once a year, around the holidays, and it skews heavily toward prep schools and elite colleges. The bright young things, some accompanied by parents, mix with a more geriatric element (there for the dancing) and a slightly aspirational crowd (there because it sounds fancy).

With such a potent cocktail, it's no surprise that rambunctiousness ensues, and there to witness the shenanigans were such so-and-so's as Jack Roosevelt and his blushing bride, Lacy, exotic pair Dartagnan and Renuka Brown, the overly educated Parker Treacy, dapper maverick Carl Deane, the highly distinguished Juan Uribe, the toothsome twosome of Liza Winship and Molly Storer, and (for the first time I can remember) a man wearing a yarmulke.

Among the choicest conversations overheard:

"I went to Princeton."

"Never heard of it."

"It's a small community college in New Jersey."

And, in somewhat poorer taste (but no less amusing):

"She looks fresh off a stripper pole."

"Think those are really hers?"

"Yes. The sugar daddy obviously bought 'em for her." ×××

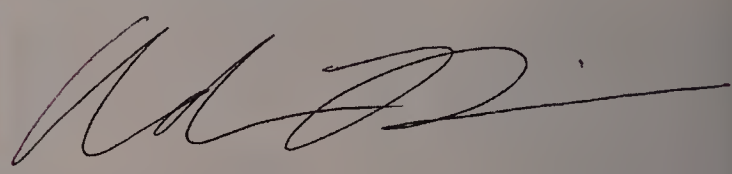
Shun Not the Bar at Towne



When the Roman poet Ovid sat down to write a very dirty book, he excused himself by saying he couldn't help it. He had meant to address a respectable topic, like slaughtering Carthaginians. But then he fell in love with a girl and lost his edge. "Who gave you, cruel boy, this power over poetry?" he raged against Cupid, arguing that the Muses, not some pantless, winged toddler, ought to be the inspiration for art. Then he wrote, "Shun Not the Temple of the Cow of Memphis," recommending it as a place to pick up chicks.

Cupid/Eros will not be denied, and it can take any imaginable form. In Neolithic sculpture, it's a size 24 nude. In Disney, it's a princess with a halo of chickadees and a voice that can shatter your teeth. In my e-mail spam, it's available without a prescription from a Canadian pharmacy. Jonathan Soroff, for his part, looks for it in his jaunty little profiles of 20 of the city's eligible unattached.

Freud himself thought that eros, as a life force, exists in conflict with thanatos, the death instinct. This is an ideal metaphor for reality TV, really, since no other art so perfectly melds the simulacra of "life" with making me want to head-butt the blade of a garden shovel. That said, "Chris from Cape Cod," the popular runner-up on the last season of The Bachelorette, is a charming, self-effacing fellow, and is an ideal cover boy for our singles issue.

WING AND A PRAYER

IN BREAKING THE ice, there's always the risk of a cold shoulder. Enter Susan Baxter, 31, founder of Hireaboston wingwoman.com, a service that provides clients with an attractive woman to back them up when they hit the singles scene. (Think Cyrano de Bergerac, except female and in open view.) "I see so many people going out, and they just sit with their friends, and later they're thinking, 'I wish I could've met someone,'" Baxter says. "We're there to help you meet that other person. You're going to have that kick in the butt." Love is a dangerous game.

NICK ALTSCHULLER

Good Eats

The Bone Corrector

Original recipe is a travesty. For a growing number of devotees, KFC now means Korean fried chicken. The wings and drumsticks at Bon Chon Chicken are dipped in a tempura-like batter, double-fried to a crisp, then glazed in either a salty-sweet soy-garlic sauce or house-made hot-chili paste. Ditch the biscuits for rice or pickled daikon cubes. (Cole slaw is available if you'd like to make a concession to the Colonel.)

SNAKE BIT

Better late than never

FEW RESTAURANTS open "on time." Financial pressures, construction glitches and licensing issues can delay, and even ultimately derail, a once-promising project. Both Bull Korean BBQ and First Printer in Harvard Square are months behind schedule. First Printer may be open by the end of February, and Bull BBQ was still waiting for a liquor license as of a few weeks ago. So it's no surprise that Poe's Chester Square Pub, originally slated to open in January, no longer has an official opening date. But neither is it a problem.

"It's got a healthy pulse; it's on target to where it should be going," says chef Brian Poe, who's working with partners Gordon Wilcox (Rattlesnake, Bukowski's) and Suzi Samowski (Bukowski's) to open the South End eatery. Want a preview of what the "pub food of the world" menu will have to offer? Check out the specials at Poe's at the Rattlesnake, like the grilled forest mushrooms with tomato-ginger confit.

EXPECT THE FORMER Six Burner to reopen in a few months with a new concept and look from the team behind Coda, Common Ground and Canary Square. There's no name yet, but co-owner Michael Moxley says it doesn't have to start with a "C."

"The C thing just sort of happened," he says. Meanwhile, Moxley is carving out a new kitchen in the "pie-shaped, challenging space" with no gas connections (the Six Burner folk used all electrical appliances). "We're thinking of a wood oven and how to vent it," says Moxley, who's planning a menu centered on salads, pressed sandwiches and flatbreads.

Beauty

The Dark Side

Plum, red wine and deep-purple lip shades added some drama to the Spring 2011 runways. While I usually stick to my light pinks and neutrals (saving darker hues for Halloween), there's something refreshing about a dark lip paired with a floral-print dress. Makeup artist Lauren Genatossio advocates the look and shares her how-to tips for those eager to test it out:

1. At first glance, many of these shades will look black in the tube—don't let that scare you. When applied, they turn into a sheer or matte version of a rich plum color that will flatter most skin tones. While I prefer this look on olive skin tones, it can be quite successful on fair skin, too.

2. If you want a deeply saturated, high-fashion/runway version of the look, use a lip brush to methodically apply the shade with short, even strokes until the area is completely pigmented. If you're a bit nervous of the commitment, use the tips of your finger to gently build the pigment onto your lips. When you get to a level that feels comfortable, stop. This effect is more like a lip stain and can be just as glamorous, but far easier to wear.

3. Despite the fact that you may often see dark lips paired with a smoky eye, I often just leave the eyes clean, keeping the lipstick the main focus. Strike a great balance by blending a light yellow-gold shadow over the entire eye area and evenly coating your lashes with a glossy black mascara. The look will complement the dark lip without overpowering it.

Going Out

Back to the Start

Quincy may have a reputation as the kind of place people go to live, not visit, but the community is undergoing a major revitalization, hearkening back to the quaint storefronts and casual bistros that drew urbanites from the the city in the '50s and '60s.

"Quincy has sports bars, Irish pubs and Chinese restaurants," says Bob Palmer, partner at Remick's, an eclectic neighborhood spot slated to launch mid-February. "We're completely different from all that." Here, with co-owners Timothy Collins and chef Marc Orfaly, it's as much about the past as the present.

A HODGEPODGE OF COMFORTABLE CHOICES.

Named for a former department store in the neighborhood, Remick's is foremost an approachable corner joint. The big-name chef comes second. "We wanted to give something back to the community that was familiar to them," Collins says. "The name Remick's is a part of Quincy and it has been for decades."

Extensive renovations began in December, when they tore down the previous establishment's large center bar and extended the ceiling to new heights. "We're big on recycling," says Palmer, motioning toward the mid-century lighting fixtures. "I found these in an old church. I was just waiting for the right place." Diners may recognize repurposed decor from the space that was once Match on Mass. Ave., including grooved wall panels that add an organic accent to the industrial look. Dark reclaimed woods contrast with white silestone tabletops.

The menu is a hodgepodge of comfortable choices, with entrées ranging from pork Wiener schnitzel and spaetzle ($19) to short ribs, braised to spoon tender ($18). Cocktails focus on updated classics, with infused simple syrups and custom bitters. At the bar, diners can opt for smaller portions, and there's a lineup of nightly live music. Communal tables encourage conversation and sharing during family-style Sunday dinners. "Everybody's connected here," Palmer says. "You've just got to ask their story."

THE LIST ART OF SUGGESTION

Howaboutwe.com, the brainchild of Brian Schechter and Aaron Schildkrout, is a dating site that matches people through suggested dates instead of ratings systems. "We're trying to put the date back in dating," Schechter says. "People want to explore the city." Here are some of the most original ideas they've encountered:

"See who can jump higher at an indoor trampoline park."

"Go to a coffee shop and spend the entire time speaking in British accents."

"Convince a bar to put Jeopardy on the TV and then play along over some beers."

"Dress up in our most hipster garb and go someplace to play hipster bingo. Google it."

"Take a half-day French class at Alliance Française, followed by drinks at Gaslight."

ASK AN AMATEUR

WHAT'S YOUR MOST MEMORABLE BREAKUP STORY?

"ONE OF MY FIRST JOBS was as a reporter on Martha's Vineyard. I started dating a really sweet, local guy. At the time, I lived in a little shack with a couple of girlfriends—it was the kind of place where you'd leave your towel outside to dry and never lock the door. After a few dates, I just didn't see it going anywhere, so I broke it off. The next day, I came home to find a bouquet of turnips on the kitchen counter. Somehow, he thought that coming into my home when no one was around and leaving root vegetables would make me see what I was missing."

JULIA RAPPAPORT ASSISTANT ARTS & LIFESTYLE EDITOR AT THE BOSTON HERALD

"WHEN I WAS IN college, I started hanging out with a girl who went to Smith. Everybody told me she was crazy, but the only time I ever really saw her was at parties. One night, she was on campus and somehow convinced my roommate to let her in. It was the first time we had ever hung out sober, and the first thing I noticed was how awful she smelled. I had no choice but to break it off immediately."

BRENDAN MCKEE PERSONAL TRAINER AT REVOLUTION FITNESS/DIRECTOR OF MENTORING AND COACHING AT INNERCITY WEIGHTLIFTING

"AROUND 10 YEARS ago, I went on vacation to Cancun and met a girl. She was from Virginia but her parents had a house on an island off the coast of Maine. I joined her family for a weekend getaway, but as soon as we were stuck on the island, we started to fight. The next morning, I woke up really early and gave a lobsterman $100 to get me back to shore."

JASON SANTOS EXECUTIVE CHEF AT GARGOYLES ON BOYLSTON SQUARE

"I HAD A WONDERFUL summer relationship that went on too long. My boyfriend came to visit on New Year's Eve, and as soon as he arrived, we both knew the spark was gone. We did touristy stuff, and then went to a huge party with a bajillion people. We ended up breaking up on the dance floor at [illegible], but because he was so drunk, we had to break up again the next morning."

Drink of the Moment

GOING TO THE MATTRESSES

A classy cocktail with a risqué name, BETWEEN THE SHEETS ($12) is where everyone should spend some time. An adaptation of the sidecar, the drink's tartness and strength make it especially popular with bartender Wembur Castillo's male clients (though he'll make it in a lowball glass if they're feeling insecure).

To deepen the flavor, the experts at RumBa chose the masculine Ron Zacapa Centenario Solera—a Guatemalan blend of rums aged at high altitude in used whisky, bourbon and sherry barrels, lending it complexity and a long, smooth finish. Although the initial citrus smack may suggest you're spiraling toward a sour pucker, the rum's medium body and the dominant flavor of Cognac create a happy balance. The effect is something like a grown-up lemonade, with wintry depth and layers of flavor. The liquors warm from within, making it a cozy, sour treat that takes the February chill to the mattresses.

GETTING AN EARFUL

Exploring the odd, unusual—frequently tedious—podcasting outskirts

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

MY LIFE'S MOST EXCESSIVE purchase is my iPod Touch. I employ no apps. I don't go online. I've never used it to watch a movie, and it holds little music. On the sliding scale of extravagance, I'm like the guy who buys a Porsche just so he can drive it in rush hour traffic.

During my own commute, my iPod serves its primary function as a podcast delivery device. I have a regular lineup of shows, all of which could fairly be deemed "mainstream." But on occasion, I do find myself checking out the dustier corners of the iTunes library. It reminds me of when I was a kid, taking my first exploratory steps away from the music on pop radio. To stimulate intellectual growth, sometimes you have to shock the system. So for a week, I strapped my headphones on like defibrillator paddles and plunged into the auditory fringe.

Perhaps still channeling my younger self, the first area I turned to was porn, and the show Porn++. The podcast features two guys dissecting scenes from current and "classic" adult movies. You'd think having been on the job since 2008, the hosts would've seen everything by now, but as they trade breakdowns, the commentary is often interrupted with an ear-shattering "WHHHAATT!?," as if somehow a particular bout of fellatio finally took sex into the 21st century. The show's only highlight was the coda, during which they discussed whether or not their parents knew about their side job. Said one cohost to the other, "In hindsight, I recommend you don't tell your dad."

On the opposite end of the spectrum was Help Me Quit Porn. I was hoping for a cheeky peek at religious self-righteousness, but after a bitching Christian rock intro, the show turned out to be just a recount of one man's struggles followed by quiet prayer. It's actually quite soothing, like having a remorseful Mr. Rogers discuss his dirty habits, then read you a passage from Corinthians.

Thinking elicited fear would be a good measure of a podcast's success, I turned to the supernatural. Sadly, the only alarming thing the Northwest Georgia Paranormal Investigation Team had to share was the bitter announcement that a team from Tennessee got first dibs on a haunted swamp house. On The Paranormal Podcast, hyperdimensional physics expert Mike Bara announced that "Newton, Einstein and quantum mechanics are all wrong," and that the 2012 apocalyptic nightmare can be avoided through the power of positive thought. He may be an idiot, but he's not a dull listen.

Boredom did, however, strike when I tried to learn about other people's hobbies. The hosts of The Antique Auction Forum brought on Mark Moran, author of price guides on everything from salt and pepper shakers to West German pottery. I feel I owe my brain a sympathy card. Then there was Crafternoon Tea with Auckland's own Grannyg, aka an hour in which I could actually feel my body aging. Steam Geeks promised a breakdown of True Grit and a discussion on the influence of Westerns on the steampunk subgenre of science fiction. Oddly, however, they began the show with more than 30 minutes of comparative whiskey tasting, and the subsequent hour was a wash.

He may be an idiot, but he's not a dull listen.

Deciding to indulge my own nerdy tastes, I dug for podcasts about movies, video games and comic books. I found Boston Bastard Brigade, a show that perpetuates negative stereotypes about both nerds and Bostonians. But I encourage you to check out Giant Fire Breathing Robot if you'd enjoy a lengthy commentary on how awesome it'd be to have director Kevin Smith's baby.

My podcast search's one salvation was Band in Boston. Light on chatter, and with tastes skewing toward Americana, the hosts list the weekly lineup at some local clubs and play select tracks. It answers the question, "I wonder what a band named Cat-Tooth Jim sounds like?" (Pretty good, actually.) The interludes allow the mind to wander, which is part of the reason I assembled my regular lineup in the first place.

Like picking your particular brand of cable news, sometimes your brain just needs the guise of edification in order to unwind—a springboard into daydreaming. All I ask, and what my quest failed to find, is that a podcast give me what I want to hear, and the freedom to not listen. ✖✖✖

TO ALL MY FAVORITE SELF-ENTITLED SOUTH END NEIGHBORS: Put down your texting paraphernalia, pick up a shovel and move your smug asses outside to clear your parking spaces. Some of us would like to be able to park when we return home from work. I know it's beneath you, but let's dip into our nearly depleted reserves of common sense and remember that we should work together… you know, like caring adults. Then you can go to the gym, look in the mirror and fall in love all over again. Waltham Street warrior

In response to "A very happy commuter":

You must not be from around here. Nobody is going to respond to anybody at all, especially if they're wishing everyone a happy holiday. Most people will think you're nuts. Don't forget, there are lots of hospitals and other 24-hour businesses—a lot of those people probably had to work that evening or Christmas Day, and that sucks. So before you go forcing your jollies on helpless commuters, think about how many people probably aren't ecstatic to be on the bus on Christmas Eve. It's great that you are, but bestow your excessive holiday spirit on people who give a crap.

To the man and woman who held the door open for us:

An Indian colleague and I were entering our Back Bay office building. As he proceeded up the stairs, I heard you say, "You have to be nice to them. EGGSISTENTIAL CRISIS

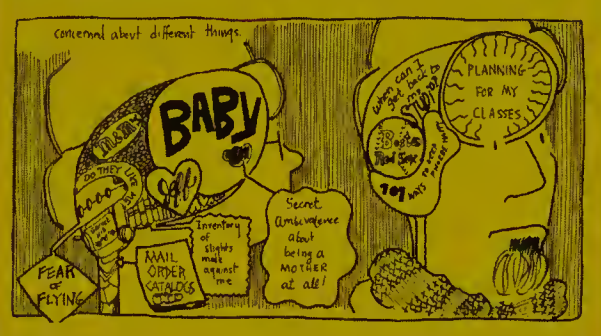
Exploring the many meanings of fertility

AN ARDUOUS, ALAS unproductive, attempt to get pregnant is one of the themes of this delightful graphic autobiography. Delivering an array of viewpoints and feelings (including the ironic thought bubbles of the author's cat), it shows us how Potts' supportive husband Jeff stoically participates in fertilization treatments. ("Release the hounds!" Phoebe cries exuberantly during the squirty egg transfer.) Elsewhere, her pregnant friends who were so easily blessed make Phoebe demur, "Oh, um still just fat."



In an oy vey spirit of humor and pain, she explores the horribly public adventure of baby-seeking, along with the comforting intimacy it produces. Phoebe observes, "I took Jeff by the hand and we floated off to Denial." Good Eggs also refers to her parents (mom is Jewish, dad not) who are tightly wrapped around her psychic life, especially when depression hits and self-critical thoughts plunk darkly into her mind. When she recovers, she's off on adventures working for organized labor ("It was a lefty multicultural heaven, heavy on women glowing with purpose."), juggling her Jewish beliefs, teaching in Mexico and searching in the unforgiving art world to find her angst-y, curious, playful niche. And falling in love, she draws herself happily in flight, held aloft by birds. ×××

BARN TO RUN In its rustic space, Bondir turns out creative dishes like the chocolate enlightenment.

PILED-UP SNOW, SLICK ICE and biting temperatures make winter a challenging time to dine out, or to run a restaurant. But it's a great time to visit Bondir, opened in November in the no-man's land between Inman, Central and Kendall squares. Chilly weather allows the restaurant to make maximum use of its most attractive feature—a large brick fireplace that dominates the sitting area by the window. Lit by an orange glow, the space takes on the mood of a rustic country inn.

With only 28 seats, Bondir adheres to a simple layout: Reclaimed wooden pews, scattered with cushions, line opposing walls to provide seating for two rows of tables. A large picture of a mangalitsa pig, a rare breed chef Jason Bond used to raise, stands watch at the far corner. Outside, an unfinished mural of a rooster continues the pastoral theme. On the restaurant's website, Bond calls his cooking "root-cellar" style, a reference to his upbringing on farms where the need to preserve the harvest dictated the daily fare.

Bondir's menu overcomes seasonal limitations through daily reshuffling. Every day at 4 pm, the night's offerings are posted online. Rather than jarring changes, they're subtle tweaks: The three complimentary house-made breads might come with goose cracklings one night and mangalitsa cracklings another. A parsnip and parsley soup seasoned with a blend of North African spices (ras el hanout) and served with marshmallow, crisp shallot, bee pollen and caviar lime might swap with a roasted carrot soup served with the same accompaniments ($9). The fare is elegant but hearty. Even complicated dishes with multiple elements, like the soups, combine simple flavors and varied textures.

The small menu encourages experimentation. Each dish, with the exception of the salad and soup, is offered in half and entrée-sized portions, allowing indecisive diners to try everything in one sitting. The best dishes I had were seafood based—in particular, the Scituate lobster. One night its accompaniments included a sauté of red cabbage and hedgehog mushrooms with a Jerusalem artichoke étoufée ($16, half; $30, full). On another, it came with roasted squash, apples, a leek tagliatelle and pickled mushrooms ($16, half; $29, full). The vegetable sides were forgettable in comparison to the butter-poached lobster itself—if it's on the menu, be sure to order a full portion. Red-meat dishes were less successful. The Double J Farm beef ($16, half; $29, full) paired tenderloin steak with a clashing and slightly bitter mole sauce, celeriac and wilted greens. A Wagyu beef brisket sauerbraten ($15, half; $28, full) was more melted fat than meat. Even the accompanying acidic red-wine-glazed carrots and shallots and sweet lady apple à la Normande couldn't cut the richness. Other dishes, like cod with a turmeric and celery fondue ($15, half; $28, full), and especially the breads, could've used a more assertive hand in flavoring. Wine selections were small but eclectic, many hailing from unusual locales like Venice, Austria and even North Truro, Mass.

Chocolate enlightenment

Dessert selections generally include a raw cow's milk cheese ($10), a fruit tart or crostata ($9), a tangerine sponge cake ($9), a chocolate semifreddo ($10) and a trio of sorbets and creams ($8). In such a small space, I suggest eavesdropping or peeking at your neighbors' selections before making your own. After hearing raves from another table, I was glad I tried the red-wine-poached pear crostata; its flaky crust was a perfect foil for the wine-soaked pear and cool almond cream. And after seeing the pyramidal chocolate semifreddo, I ordered the chocolate enlightenment, served with a parsnip puree, rooibos froth, hazelnut dacquoise and a candied Buddha's hand (a citrus fruit with tentacle fingers). The parsnip and rooibos brought out the earthy flavors of the chocolate, while the crisp dacquoise and chewy citrus formed a pleasant contrast.

Service on two of my three visits was outstanding—the hostess and genial waitstaff were obviously committed to our comfort. The last visit disappointed—our waiter forgot to bring the wine until after our food had arrived, didn't offer us bread (until asked) and omitted the delicious after-dinner macaroons (entirely). Hopefully that experience was just an off-night, because Bondir inspires high hopes. ✖✖✖

POWERLESS

This blackout thing is getting old.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

GROWING UP IN MAINE, power outages were a fact of life. It was a fun irony that we lived within the evacuation radius of the Maine Yankee nuclear power plant, yet the reactor's energy often failed to make the 15-mile trip to our house. But in the boonies, you expect power outages. You've got woodstoves and lanterns and guns. Up there, you're basically one step away from living in the 1800s anyway, so a blackout is no big deal. But when you live eight miles from the Massachusetts statehouse, as I do now, you don't expect to lose your power. Which makes it all the more traumatic when it happens.

In 10 years of living in Boston, I'd never experienced an electrical outage. So far this winter, it's happened twice. You know those "dig safe" signs that warn about buried power cables? In my neighborhood, you can dig wherever you want, because all the power lines are strewn overhead in a festive high-voltage tangle. At least until it snows or a sparrow alights on a line, at which point the wires collapse into the street, plunging us all into a state of pitch-black anarchy.

The romantic notion about power outages is that they give you a chance to ditch the Internet and TV and connect with your fellow human beings, playing Scrabble by candlelight and sipping hot chocolate beside a roaring fire. The truth is that you're plunged into a terrifying, Mad Max postapocalyptic dystopia, a nightmare from which you can't wait to awaken.

When the lights go off, you immediately realize how many devices in your house require electricity. The stove. The furnace. The coffeemaker. (For about a half hour, I seriously ponder whether I can boil water on our gas grill and MacGyver myself a cup.) And what if I want to shred some papers? I can't, which makes me suddenly want to shred some papers. That pedal-powered, solar-backup shredder looked silly when I saw it in the Brookstone catalog, but who's laughing now?

I can live without lights. I can live without Internet. I can even live without TV, because TLC airs reruns of My Strange Addiction, so You're in a terrifying, Mad Max post-apocalyptic dystopia.

I won't miss the upcoming episode about the guy who can't stop hiring albinos to dress in Revolutionary garb and joust aboard model trains. But heat is hard to do without. So, with nightfall approaching, the thermometer dropping, and still no power, I make an executive decision: We're going to a hotel.

But first, we have to get off the island. "But Ez," you say, "I didn't know you lived on an island." Well, neither did I. When I first moved to my neighborhood, I heard old-timers say things like, "Around here, there's one way in, and one way out." But I figured they were just being dramatic, because in two years, I'd never seen the road flood. Well, it's a weakness of human psychology that if something's never happened to you personally, you expect it never will. In the financial world, this kind of event is called a "black swan," which means an event so rare, it's like a ballet movie that guys might want to watch because it involves hot, psycho lesbians. Right now, we've got a meteorological black swan on our hands, because my path down Sea Street is impeded by about 100 yards of actual sea. A line of cars stretches to the water's edge, and, on the far shore, a tow truck is winching a Cadillac out of the abyss while the chaos is filmed by a news team. Somewhere in Florida, a bunch of tan jerks are watching all of this on TV and snickering over their daiquiris.

This kind of moment tests your manhood. Do you turn back with a whimper and hope the industrious fellows at NStar can restore the electricity before your starving dogs start gnawing on your frostbitten extremities? Or do you point the wheels into a washout in the hopes that you'll make it to the other side and on to the paradise of the Hampton Inn?

Here's the calculus: Is it worth the risk of total vehicle destruction, hypothermia and drowning just for a few hours of takeout pizza and cable TV? Of course not. But now that I pulled out of line and up to the edge of the water, turning around would make me look like a total wuss.

So, the Hampton Inn was great. But next time the lights go out, we'll head to Patriot Place and kill some time shopping. I expect they'll have power at the Bass Pro Shops. And if not, at least they've got lanterns and guns. ✖✖✖

COLD SNAP

The Patriots need to get their playoff edge back.

I WAS SPEECHLESS. That's right, Chris Collins, the guy with an opinion—warped as it may be—on everything sport, had nothing to say on that particular Sunday night. As the Jets steamrolled the Patriots, I watched silently.

In the preceding weeks, I'd been fielding text messages from friends and family asking me about my plans for Dallas. They wanted to know about the hotel, the parties, the accommodations, the famed Tuesday Media Day and everything else I've previously experienced following the New England Patriots into the Super Bowl. (Of course, most of the inquiries came with obligatory addendums like "Do you have any extra seats?" or "If you come across any tickets, let me know.")

Mind you, the Patriots exceeded all of our expectations. In early September, they stunk. In early October, they were decent. In November and December, for the most part, they were the normal Patriots machine, ripping off eight straight wins to finish the regular season.

Tom Brady was at the top of his game. Bill Belichick was proving himself to be the best coach in history. And the Patriots could not be denied. That's what I told myself and anybody who'd listen. I was drinking the Bob Kraft Kool-Aid.

Can you blame me? The chips fell right into place. Baltimore, the only team this genius thought could potentially put a roadblock in front of the Patriots' Super Bowl run, was eliminated the day before. There was no way the Pittsburgh Steelers were going to come to Foxborough and win. The Patriots are the Steelers' daddy.

Hindsight being 20-20, I was an imbecile. I didn't want to see the reality that the Patriots defense was a product of its head coach, whose schemes have a way of hiding his team's flaws.

You can go back to Jets coach Rex Ryan's press conference before the Patriots' first encounter with New York in the 2009 season. The chubby, boisterous coach stated that the Patriots had the advantage at coach and quarterback. We thought he was goading us.

Yet when push came to shove, the Patriots lost both those battles in this year's AFC Divisional game at Gillette Stadium. I realize that everybody has bad days, but the Patriots' bad days are too often in January.

It's hard to believe that the Pats are winless in their last three playoff games. Belichick and Brady are, according to most reasonable people, the best in the world at what they do. Sure, they led New England to four Super Bowl berths and three Lombardi Trophies, and yes, they are the undisputed team of the last decade in the NFL. But the current, talented Patriots seem to lack something those winning squads had.

Those days of certitude, when a first-round bye, home-field advantage and two straight wins seemed assured, have long disappeared. The rest of the NFL knows it, too. Those damn New York Giants figured something out, and while it's hard to do, bothering Brady can be done.

The old Patriots, the guys led by Tedy Bruschi, Ty Law, Richard Seymour and Mike Vrabel, would've made the Jets pay for running their mouths. They wouldn't have accepted what we saw, which was a confused football team that couldn't survive a lousy game by its quarterback.

I realize the Pats have won 28 straight at home during the regular season. But making the playoffs isn't what's important. Winning championships is. And maybe that's what has been lost here. The Patriots have become so focused on consistent excellence that they've lost sight of the ultimate prize.

I also realize that these Patriots are maturing, but they're still an inexperienced team, especially on defense. Although Belichick and his staff have been able to coach guys up to speed, and veterans like Brady and Vince Wilfork educate their younger teammates, it's impossible to simulate in practice exactly what the playoffs are like in terms of intensity and physicality. The playoffs are a different animal. Truthfully, it's the team that plays like a pack of wild animals that usually wins in January. That used to be us.

Remember when Rodney Harrison would talk to the press before a big playoff game as if he were angry at the world, convincing himself that the Patriots weren't being shown the proper respect? I miss those Patriots.

This team needs to find a way to bring that heat back to January football. We won't know if they will for another 12 months, which stinks. I'm impatient. And I'm used to seeing results from my team.

I do have one enormous fear: The Patriots have started to emulate the Bruins—regular season studs, playoff duds. That not only leaves me speechless, it's beginning to make me feel sick.

Make me believe again, Patriots. ×××

ON WES, PERK, OCHO AND IZZY

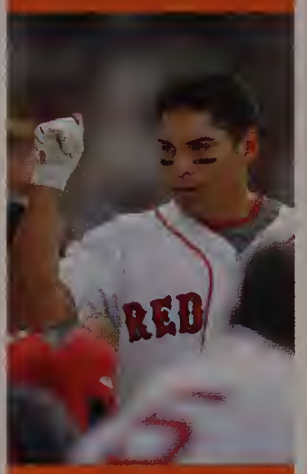
5 WINTER STORYLINES

BRACE YOURSELF Perkins is back in the mix.

Shoulder to Lean On Lost in all the excitement over the Sox winter frenzy is the fact that Adrian Gonzalez could be a month away from even swinging a bat. That doesn't mean it's time to freak out, especially given that his recovery from off-season shoulder surgery may be a little ahead of schedule. But still, we'll all breathe an El Guapo–sized sigh of relief when A-Gon's officially back. (Or organize a mass-plunge off the Green Monster if he's still hurting in April).

Speaking of Old-School Sox Neither is a shadow of what he once was, but you're crazier than Izzy Alcántara if you think Manny Ramirez and Johnny Damon won't make their presence felt in Tampa. Granted, that might not translate into more wins, but the Sox/Rays rivalry is about to enter strange, unchartered waters. Hide yo' kids, hide yo' wives, hide yo' traveling secretaries, because the Idiots are back in the AL East!

Footloose So, Wes Welker says he regrets speaking out about Rex Ryan's filthy little foot fetish? Of course he does! But that's only because Bill Belichick blew it way out of proportion. Obviously, I understand why the Sweatshirt ruled the way he did; he has a reputation to maintain. But in the process, Belichick turned a harmless little joke into a big regrettable mess.



The Rookie If I'd told you last summer that the Bruins would feature a high-scoring rookie forward, you'd have said, "Yeah, I know. He was the No. 2 pick!" But the joke's on you, imaginary reader, because so far it's not Tyler Seguin but Brad Marchand who's emerged as the B's most NHL-ready rook. No need to worry about the franchise, though. Despite sharing the "rookie" label with Marchand, Seguin Genesis is still three and a half years younger.

Perk Up Kendrick Perkins' inspirational return means a few things for the C's. It reunites the starting five—who still haven't lost in the playoffs. It gives them a much-needed lift in light of Jermaine O'Neal's disappearing act and the other O'Neal's winter-long role in Shaq vs. Boredom. And finally, it means the Scowl is back in our lives! Welcome back, Perk. Your first fine's on me.

1 ONE OFF-SEASON PRIORITY

CBA uncertainty has complicated things, but Logan Mankins feels like one of those guys that the Pats need to find a way to bring back. It's easier said than done, considering the lineman can be as stubborn as the oxen he spends the off-season with, but he's worth the aggravation.

2 INJURY UPS + DOWNS

Clean Bill I can't wait to see Gonzalez and Carl Crawford take the field for the Sox, but at this point, the healthy returns of Jacoby Ellsbury and Dustin Pedroia are just as critical. It seems like forever since we've seen the best of what either guy has to offer. Especially Ellsbury, who still has the potential to be the most exciting player in the lineup.

Off the Marc I'd love to stop writing about Marc Savard's concussions. And after 11 months of the same old sad story, you'd think the guy would finally catch a break. But it looks like the injury, and the mess that initially caused it, might haunt this team forever. (I have the sudden urge to hit Matt Cooke with a shovel.)

4 Valentine's Day MESSAGES

Hey There, LeBron... Now I don't usually do this, but I wanted to send a quick note to let you know just how much you mean to me. I find a new way to love you every day, LeBron. And I'll always be your No. 1 fan. Happy Valentine's Day, you sexy thing, you. Love, LeBron

To My Future Coach... Bill, just gimme a chance! Man, you know I can make you happy! I'll do anything! Don't like my name? Fine, I'll change it again. I'll even let you choose. What do you want? Chad Bon Jovi? Anything! Just let me in, coach. Sincerely, 85 (or any number you want me to be).

To My Missing Pair... Guys, uh, where'd ya go? You know, things just aren't the same without ya around. To comfort me in times of need and bring me up when I'm feeling down. She, uh, ran a marathon in you guys, for Christ's sake. That stench changed my life! So, uh, just know I'm thinking about ya, and I miss ya. Your pal, Rex.

Coach Lovie-Dovey... On this special day, I wanted to let you know one more time just how sorry I am for what happened against the Packers. There've been a lot of rumors out there, and this isn't easy for me to say, but... Ouch! Damn! A paper cut!?! Well, that's all for me.... Hey, Collins, come finish this up!

3 DATES TO WATCH

ALL CELTICS EDITION

2/6: Screw the Super Bowl! The Magic are in town to make amends for last month's loss—and to pick up Dwight's teddy bear. (He forgot it at the team hotel.)

2/10: Better get that Lakers-hate out while you can. After tonight, they won't be back until June.

2/13: The Heat are in Boston, where they'll try for their first win in three chances against the C's. Program note: In observance of Valentine's Day Eve, Kevin Garnett plans to rip out Chris Bosh's heart.

"We were more like friends than husband-wife material."

Soroff On CHRIS LAMBTON

The Bachelorette star opens up about dating, getting dumped and the meaning of reality.

CAPE COD LANDSCAPER CHRIS LAMBTON, 33, rocketed to reality TV stardom as the runner-up on the last season of The Bachelorette. The audience favorite, he was passed over by Ali Fedotowsky, and then turned down ABC's offer to star in the next season of The Bachelor. A Dennis native, he was a math teacher in New York before going home to care for his mother, who later died of ALS. Since his run on TV, he returned to private life, working in his family's landscaping business and raising money to fight ALS. He judges a "Best Pickup Line Contest" on Feb. 3 at the Cask 'N Flagon.

Jonathan Soroff: What possessed you to look for love on a reality TV show?
Chris Lambton: Honestly, there are stranger places to find love than on TV, so I figured why not give it a shot?

So you didn't get love, but you got fame and money. How are those as consolation prizes?
[Laughs.] I got no love. I got strange fame, and I really didn't get any money, so I guess one out of three ain't bad.

Would you have married Ali Fedotowsky if she'd picked you?
I doubt it. We were more like friends than husband-wife material.

What is the thing you value most in a woman?
A sense of humor.

Biggest turnoff?
Being a bitch.

Why didn't you go back to being a teacher?
It's tiring as hell. Long hours. I didn't make enough money teaching, so I had to coach, which means I was working 'til seven or eight and then going to grad-school classes.

Teaching is harder than landscaping?
Oh, God, yeah. Definitely. You're not just teaching. You're a psychologist. You're a sex therapist. You're everything else AND a teacher. Teachers deserve to make more money than TV stars, sports stars.

With respect to the landscaping thing, how often do people make jokes about bush?
Ugh, trimming bush, pruning hedges, mowing lawns… I've heard it all.

On the show, do you think a couple of the other bachelors might've been gay?
A couple of them definitely took more time in the shower and had more beauty products than most girls I've dated.

Did some just want to further their careers?
Definitely. The wrestler was there just to be a douche and promote himself.

For the sake of curiosity, define "reality."
"Reality" is the furthest thing from reality that is real. [Laughs.]

So what part of having your dating life televised seemed like a good idea to you?
I think none of it was appealing, but I didn't realize it until it was too late, when I was sitting there, watching it with my father and brothers, saying, "What the hell did I do?"

Worst part of it?
Getting dumped on national TV. Not exactly a moment you want other people to see.

Did they prompt you to say certain things?
They like confrontation, so they'd want me to talk about the other guys, and it's something I never did. They'd want me to ask stupid questions to Ali, and I'd be like, "No. That's dumb."

If you had won, how would life be different?
Oh, God. I'd be engaged. And I'd be under strict contract to ABC.

Fakest thing about reality TV?
There's a thousand hours of film cut to an hour and a half, so basically, you are as you're edited.

Were you edited fairly?
I was edited very well. They can only do so much. So in my case, they just edited me as the poor kid who lost his mom.

Weirdest thing you've read about yourself?
This summer, I read that I take home multiple women every night. My dad actually read it and asked me if it was true. I was like, "Dad, I live upstairs. I have to walk past your room every night." He was like, "I didn't think so. I was just checking."

What about the creepiest fan come-on?
I was at work one day. And when I got home, there was a vase with pictures on the kitchen table with a four-page note. She had broken in. From then on we started locking our doors.

Weird stuff in the mail?
The cleverest was a softball covered in pictures of the girl that said, "Chris, you're a great catch." I've gotten T-shirts, lingerie, Dunkin' Donuts gift cards…

Any guys come on to you?
[Laughs.] Not yet. I'm sure it'll happen.

What if Playgirl asked you to pose?
Oh, God, no! [Laughs.]

Worst part of being a landscaper?
Waking up early.

Will your life ever be normal again?
It was normal the day I got home from Tahiti. My brother was like, "Welcome back," and I said, "I'll need a few days." He was like, "What? You were in Tahiti! Start working." My brother, friends and dad keep me normal.

Do you consider yourself good-looking?
Above average.

What's your best feature?
Probably my height—I'm 6'3". Or my eyes. They're hazel, which are different.

Ever play hard to get?
Yeah, with ABC when they asked me to be on The Bachelor. But I don't like playing games.

Something I'd be shocked to learn about you?
I'm an absolute slob. My room is a disaster. I'm not a clean person.

Last question: Will you mow my lawn naked?
[Laughs.] I've been asked that before. No, I don't want a sunburn down there. ✖✖✖

OUR ANNUAL ROUNDUP of the CITY'S COOLEST SINGLES

BY JONATHAN SOROFF
PHOTOGRAPHS BY ADAM DETOUR

BEING UNATTACHED HAS advantages. You can eat dinner in your underpants. You can sing country music, badly, without fear of reprisals. No one will judge you for watching Hoarders.

Another plus: You might meet someone like the 20 singles presented here, in our annual roster of Boston's most desirable bachelors and bachelorettes. As always, there are 10 men and 10 women. As always, we fashioned our list from reader nominations and the highlights in our own address books. The result is an eclectic group of accomplished, appealing, unmarried people—which isn't to say that they're necessarily desperate to hear from you. They all have busy schedules.

And they all have our approval, being fun, talented Bostonians who'd shine at any flirtatious cocktail soiree. ❤

HERE, THEN, ARE BOSTON'S MOST ELIGIBLE SINGLES, CLASS OF 2011.

Tom O'Keefe

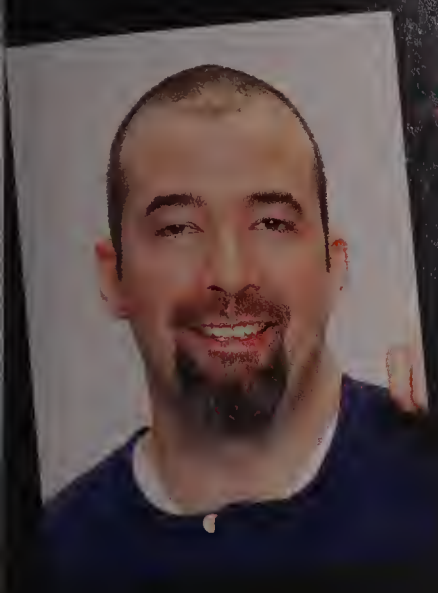
"21+", INTERNET ENTREPRENEUR

Born and raised in Poughkeepsie, N.Y., he came to town to study politics and economics at Boston College before working as a financial analyst. Then he shifted gears and started five different Internet companies over the past 11 years. The latest is a Twitter-based information source about all aspects of life in Boston, and has attracted 25,000 followers. He's the local rep for the collective-buying behemoth Groupon and the founder of a new venture called b.social. Cycling is his only distraction from the digital world, but since he eschews cars and public transit, he regularly logs 10–15 miles per day by foot. A devoted music fan, he's seen U2 live 34 times and owns four guitars, none of which he plays particularly well. Through his online presence he's been able to create awareness for several charities, for which he also volunteers. Among them: the Greater Boston Food Bank, Community Servings and the Home For Little Wanderers. Interested ladies had better not be allergic to cats—he owns one named Jara, a rescued animal from the MSPCA.

Kara Hurston

25, HAIR STYLIST

Our lesbian bachelorette belongs to a splinter faction of hipster haircutters who abandoned Newbury Street to create the South Boston salon Shag. A North Shore native who grew up in Rhode Island, she studied cosmetology at the Paul Mitchell School and boasts some of the city's edgiest trendsetters as her clients. No wonder, since she's one herself. She's often pressed into service for fashion shows and editorial shoots, and this past fall she officially "arrived" by working Fashion Week in New York. While she's influenced by fashion icons like Edie Sedgwick, she approaches styling hair the way a painter approaches a canvas—and she approaches canvases that way, too, since she's an artist in every sense. Soccer has been both a passion and a strength; she's competed at the national level and in tournaments all over the country. Nowadays, she loves scouring thrift stores for vintage clothing and furniture. The Yorkie/poodle mix to whom she's utterly devoted is named Mae. When indie filmmakers look to cast the super-cool iconoclastic dream girl, she's their Platonic ideal.



Erin Sullivan

30, TAX MANAGER

This Midwestern lass earned two advanced degrees (a JD and LLM) and works in the tax department of one of the world's leading private investment firms (with roughly $65 billion under management). She's a born athlete and will be running her second Boston Marathon this year, while she also waterskis, surfs and has recently taken up skiing. While keeping up with her monthly book club, she loves to travel (a trip to the Amalfi coast is in the works for this summer) and she attends as many live music performances as her schedule will allow. Her quieter interests include amateur photography and WWII history. Despite living alone, she shops at Costco, and the surplus rolls of paper towels in her oven are an indication of how often she cooks. Her hectic schedule includes extensive charitable work for Multiple Sclerosis and other causes. An Ohio girl through-and-through, she smiles at strangers and actually waits for an answer to "How are you?" Hot dogs, sports and American beer are her idea of a good time. She's also highly ambitious: She keeps "bucket lists" for every year and every decade of her life, and has already checked a great many items off (although the sky-diving scheduled for October will now have to wait for spring). One caveat: She's a practical joker. Anyone who's interested had better bring his A-game.

Jason Cheek

30, SOUS CHEF

A Southern gentleman in the best sense of the term, this North Carolina transplant serves as the trusted second-in-command to his friend Josh Buehler at KO Prime. Cheek moved to Boston three years ago and loves the city despite his ongoing search for a good pulled-pork sandwich—which explains his enthusiasm for his restaurant's weekly "Nose to Tail" night. In his spare time, he likes sampling new whiskeys, watching sports (he's a committed ACC basketball freak) and eating as much good food as possible. He also likes to draw, although he considers cooking its own art form. In addition to his involvement with the Slow Food movement and National Farmer's Association, he supports KO Prime in its work on behalf of Autism Speaks. He was named best new chef in 2007 by the News and Observer for opening the restaurant South (in North Carolina). Even better: He's won two wing-eating competitions. Most impressive of all, his upbringing hardwired him to treat women with courtesy and respect: opening doors, pulling out chairs… Rhett Butler has nuthin' on him.

Sonya Cosentini

32, PR EXECUTIVE

A spunky go-getter, she studied journalism and public relations at Emerson College, where she was class president and graduated summa cum laude. She now works as manager of media relations and spokesperson for TJX. Her job requires everything from working with celebrities and coordinating fashion shoots to appearing on national TV to discuss seasonal trends. An avid reader, she can be found at the library or in a coffee shop with her nose in a book. She's learning to cook from her Italian grandmother, and she's developed a passion for running (4–6 miles a day), as well as for pilates and yoga. Even though she's an intrepid traveler, she loves the charm of home and often visits her family in western Mass. On the charity front, she raises money for domestic violence prevention and impoverished children, most notably through Save the Children. A delightful mix of determined and down-to-earth, she's an overachiever who makes it all look effortless.

Omar Thomas 26, ASSISTANT PROFESSOR

Our gay bachelor is an assistant professor of harmony at Berklee College of Music, where he teaches music theory and chairs the LGBT alliance. Raised in Delaware, he earned his M.Mus. from New England Conservatory but has been composing and arranging since the age of 12. His 17-piece jazz band, Omar Thomas Large Ensemble, will release its first album, I Am, in mid-2011. An active spirit, he jingles his bells for charity in the annual Santa Speedo Run. Otherwise, he loves '70s soul music and a good cocktail. A member of the Fenway Health Board of Visitors, he also belongs to ASCAP, which gave him its Young Jazz Composer award in 2008, and he was nominated for Jazz Artist of the Year by the Boston Music Awards. His biggest inspiration is Billy Strayhorn (Duke Ellington's openly gay pianist and arranger), and we're willing to bet he'll someday be an inspiration for future jazz greats himself.

Kimberly Walleston 24, FASHION CORRESPONDENT

This New Hampshire girl jokes she was raised in the mountains by wolves, but she turned out awfully polished. Besides graduating summa cum laude and as a member of both the Alpha Chi and the Lambda Pi Eta Communication honor societies at Colby-Sawyer College, she won an award for writing a series of children's books on environmental literacy. Now she works as the host of "Fashion Forward" on Styleboston, which airs on WCVB-TV Channel 5. Her job requires her to troll through the city's boutiques and to hang out at glamorous fashion events—in other words, to do what a lot of other people do for fun. In her time off, she enjoys hiking, camping and snowboarding in the White Mountains, and cooking with local, organic food. A multimedia artist, her most recent work was a charcoal, acrylic and watercolor cityscape of the Dubai skyline. She's a big fan of watching Boston sports. On the participatory side, she played volleyball in high school and danced (mostly jazz and hip-hop) throughout childhood and college. Her skill in Brazilian jujitsu gives her confidence to tackle the rowdiest barroom. Oxfam America and various environmental initiatives keep her active, as do her five dogs—four rat terriers and a Yorkie. A refreshing balance of urbane sensibility and rural values, she might buy a lot of shoes, but she never forgets the pleasures of bare feet.

Jennifer Glickman

29, INTERIOR DESIGNER

After studying art history at UVA, she received an M.A. in interior design from Suffolk University, while a grad school stint in Florence, Italy, offered a thorough immersion in art and architecture. As a freelance interior designer, she works for universities, libraries, residences, commercial spaces and restaurants. Her most recent project: Isabelle's CurlyCakes, the new Beacon Hill cupcake shop by Todd English's daughter. Her passions include Bikram yoga and running, but having grown up in the Virginia countryside, she loves everything about the outdoors. She sketches to relax, and she sometimes drops in on figure-drawing classes. Not surprisingly, she spends most of her disposable income on furniture finds and is an unapologetic architecture nut. She's a member of the Boston Society of Architects, and this year cochaired a committee that organized a fashion show for the International Interior Design Association. Her half-Korean, half-Russian background boasts the added flourish of a Southern accent. She's like a hothouse flower that can handle the toughest terrain.

Jared Banner

25, AMATEUR SCOUTING COORDINATOR FOR THE RED SOX

The name alone has a superhero sound. Growing up in Brooklyn, he was a state champion wrestler in high school before switching to baseball at Amherst, where he got a B.A. in psychology. As a coordinator of amateur scouting for the Red Sox (he might've grown up a Mets fan, but he's a loyal citizen of the nation now), he spends most of his time traveling in search of the next Dustin Pedroia or Jon Lester. His hobbies include Bikram yoga, boxing and pickup basketball, while his taste in books tends toward nonfiction. Hailing from the land of Jay-Z and Biggie, he likes to end a night on the town wherever the DJs spin the best hip-hop. A member of the advisory board for the charity Smallbean, he also participates in the Susan G. Komen Race for the Cure. He was only 22 when he received his first World Series ring. If you're the girl he likes enough to put a ring on, expect something on the conspicuous side.

Ben Dolgoff

25, TECH ENTREPRENEUR

This Hyannis boy cofounded Peekaboo Mobile, a start-up that developed an app that uses your smart phone's GPS to find nearby discounts—flash the cashier your cell and claim the savings. Dolgoff contemplated a career as a pro golfer, studying "professional golf management" during his first year in college down South, before earning a finance degree from Suffolk University (where he still captained the golf team). A volunteer at Rosie's Place and the Greater Boston Food Bank, he likes running and tennis, but when work and weather permit, you'll find him at the beach. He's an avid networker on the start-up scene and often speaks on "mobile expert" panels. He calls the North End home and would rather do just about anything than veg on the couch. Added bonus: If you split the check on a date with him, you're guaranteed to get the best possible deal.

Mike Young

30, CONCERT PROMOTER/ PHOTOGRAPHER

Picture the guy in High Fidelity if he had a high-powered job in the arts and was actually cool. As the director of concert marketing and promotions at the Citi Performing Arts Center, he's worked with everyone from Yo Gabba Gabba! to Lady Gaga. The closest thing he has to an addiction is photography, especially of live concerts—he's been spat on, tackled and found himself as the only obstacle between an artist and 20,000 rabid fans when the barricade collapsed. He wields a camera like a networking tool, an easy icebreaker to strike up a conversation with anyone. Vintage equipment is especially to his taste because he likes the idea of capturing history with something that's a piece of history itself. In guest DJ gigs for Weekly Wax at River Gods (under the name Young DMC), he indulges an obsession for playlists. His vacations tend to feature places with exciting mountain roads; not surprisingly, he loves cars. Since he's a movie buff, too, drive-ins are his idea of heaven. He runs and practices yoga to stay in shape, and is actively involved in the Epic Man project, which raises money for charity. This epic man is all about art, intensity and a sense of adventure.

Gina Patterson

26, VICTIM/WITNESS ADVOCATE FOR THE BPD HOMICIDE UNIT

The real-life version of those hotties on Law & Order, she works as a liaison between homicide detectives and victims' families to ensure they receive the resources, support and information they need. At Simmons College, she double majored in biopsychology and women's studies. While living abroad, she published articles in the book Women to Women: Young Americans in South Africa, and she's currently considering a master's degree in social policy. A dedicated foodie, she blogs her reviews on Youngsophisticatedfoodie.wordpress.com, practices meditation and yoga, and is broad-minded enough to enjoy both Real Housewives and NPR. Because her parents are from Jamaica and Trinidad, she attends the annual West Indian carnivals in Boston and New York, dancing with abandon to soca, reggae and the steel pan. She teaches classes at a domestic violence shelter and belongs to Alpha Kappa Alpha (the oldest African American sorority), as well as to Catalyst, an organization at the MFA. She also serves as Alumnae Class President at Simmons. In short, her sense of social justice isn't her only beautiful trait.

Bonnie Cardillo

30, DESIGNER, STYLIST AND WARDROBE CONSULTANT

It's rare to meet someone who both lives for fashion and who's down-to-earth and approachable. A visual merchandising manager for the upscale preppy shop Vineyard Vines, she also owns Style101, a wardrobe consulting business, and designs jewelry for her own brand. She enjoys dancing, antiquing, reading, shopping and anything sports related. A natural athlete, she plays golf and tennis, runs, skis, hikes and is learning to sail. On her travels abroad, she collects vintage postcards, and through the UVM Young Alumni Committee, she volunteers with organizations like the Charles River Cleanup, the Pine Street Inn and the Women's Lunch Place. She's also an MSPCA-Angell donor. A born explorer, she backpacked solo all over Europe, and if she didn't love her work, she'd travel nonstop. A dynamo with looks to boot, most guys would need daily vitamin B shots just to keep up.

Brad Marchand

22, PRO HOCKEY PLAYER

The Bruins' Number 63 may not be the biggest bruiser in the NHL (he's 5'9"), but he's as scrappy as they come. Even so, he's a gentleman when the skates come off. Born and raised in Nova Scotia, he represented Canada twice in the World Junior Ice Hockey Championships (2007 and 2008), helping to bring home the gold both times. The Bruins drafted him in 2006, and he made his National Hockey League debut in 2009 against the Nashville Predators. His off-ice hobbies include gaming (he's an Xbox aficionado), movies and dining out. Aside from hockey, this all-around sportsman plays golf and tennis, enjoys hunting, fishing and spending time by the water. He participates in numerous charity golf tournaments and pays frequent hospital visits to lift the spirits of patients. Any interested woman must love dogs; he owns a husky/shepherd mix. An added bonus: So far, he still has all his own teeth.

Jennifer Canesi

28, NURSE PRACTITIONER

A hotter, hipper version of Florence Nightingale, she graduated summa cum laude from Boston College in 2005, and with honors from a master's program at MGH. She now works as a nurse practitioner in aesthetic dermatology, which blends her lifelong love of medicine (she comes from a family of doctors) and her passion for art. Raised in Foxborough, she has season tickets to the Patriots, but she's also an impressive athlete herself. Spring triathlons and road races keep her active, and she's run the Boston Marathon. Proving her generosity and inventiveness, she arranged a giving program that allocates a portion of her salary to a different charity each month. She's also a member of the American Association of Aesthetic Medicine and Surgery. Beauty, in her case, goes a lot more than skin deep.

Michael Haruto Oshima

(AKA DJ SANKYU) 24, JUDO INSTRUCTOR AND DJ

He was raised in Boston but went to Tokai University in Japan and then Harvard, where he earned a B.A. in linguistics (in other words, he can quote Chomsky). He also won the 2009 Collegiate Judo National Championship. In addition to teaching at the Tohoku Judo Club, he blogs, writes and spins music. Mashups are an interest, as are Italian Renaissance art, calligraphy, soccer, filmmaking and the writings of Japanese author Haruki Murakami. On the flip side, he enjoys strange and/or zombie movies, offering dubious advice and mahjongg. He's also got a subversive sense of humor: When asked about his interests, he lists "polyamory," "narwhals" and "bacon," and he identifies one of his talents as doing a good impression of Stitch from Lilo & Stitch. In addition to English, he speaks Japanese, Portuguese and Spanish. In the future, he wants to write and direct a film. Or have one made about him.

Abe Donner 33, SNEAKER EXECUTIVE

This Duke University graduate is the Latin America manager for New Balance sneakers. In addition to mastery of the secret workings of the athletic footwear business, his job demands an intimate understanding of Latin American culture—so even though he's a gringo, he can do the Latin lover thing. Previously, he worked at Nike, which sent him to Buenos Aires, Argentina, to manage its soccer apparel business. He's an avid runner who also enjoys cycling, waterskiing, downhill skiing and golf. A doting uncle to his two-year-old niece, it goes without saying he's a rabid fan of Blue Devil basketball. Any lady hoping to snag him had better keep her passport up to date: He's visited more than 30 countries, and a passion for pizza has driven him to try and eat at least one slice in every city he visits. Urbane and worldly, he knows not to take himself too seriously. Most embarrassing moment: spilling a bottle of red wine all over himself in front of Matthew McConaughey's girlfriend, Sports Illustrated swimsuit model Camila Alves.

Julie Scallen 44, LAWYER

A high-powered Renaissance woman, she earned a B.A. in French from Wellesley College before getting her JD at NYU Law School, where she was on the Law Review. Since then, she's risen steadily to become a partner in the corporate department of Bingham McCutchen, LLP, the behemoth international firm. She worked hard to get there, and not surprisingly, she still works hard, but she knows how to let loose. A world traveler, she's a wine enthusiast who's still comfortable at a Patriots tailgate (with clients). Climbing to the top means staying in shape, so she swims and practices yoga. A quiet afternoon might find her at a museum or gallery, indulging her taste for modern art. Lest she sound too buttoned-up, she has a passion for fashion and a love of French literature, even at its most avant-garde.

Dan Fitzgerald 32, SPORTS RETAILER

A guy's guy who's not a slob, this Tewksbury native studied economics and philosophy at Boston College, where he was captain of the track and field team. With his teammate and best friend, Justin Burdon, he founded the South End Athletic Company, where he serves as a buyer, designer and salesperson. If that weren't exhausting enough, he operates a personal coaching business and still finds time to surf and snowboard. Attending live music shows is another hobby, and he's got a penchant for restaurant-hopping in the South End. He and his business partner host numerous charitable events in their store, where up to 20 percent of sales are earmarked for a worthwhile cause. Authenticity and empathy are the traits he values most in others. Any girl lucky enough to land alongside him is guaranteed a genuine mensch.

Trish Fontanilla 27, FREELANCER

A graduate of Emerson College, where she received too many awards and accolades to mention, she worked at Berklee College of Music as the department coordinator of music therapy. Now a freelancer, she consults on web materials, PR, booking bands, social-media marketing, planning events and writing articles—in short, she's a Trish of all trades. She loves live music and theater, and is an avid Celtics fan whose heckling belies her innocent appearance. As a musician, she dabbles in guitar, piano and singing, and she's built her own drum from scratch. Next up: a ukulele. Charity work may be her strongest suit. She's deeply involved with Boston Cares and was a fund-raising/philanthropy fellow in its Civic Leadership Institute. She also volunteers with Community Servings, Room to Grow, the Friday Night Supper Program, Big Sister Association, Haley House Bakery Café, Boston Living Center and—honestly—numerous others. She estimates that she's volunteered for 40 local nonprofits since 2002, proving she has a heart as impressive as her résumé.

Miami is the opposite of Boston, style-wise. I definitely had more bright, flashy, colorful clothing there.

I've always loved crowns—it's the symbol for my company. This is a vintage crown pin.

There are two amazing vintage/antique stores I go to in New Hampshire for jewelry: the Concord Antique Gallery and Log House Antiques.

I wear a lot of neutrals, but I like something that pops.

I worked in Miami for a year and a half as Anna Kournikova's assistant, so I traveled everywhere and would go to different fashion shows.

She was shopping in Gucci, Chanel and Fendi, and I'm like, "OK, I've never been to any of these stores!" So I learned a lot about fashion that way.

I try to dress for the occasion. I'm not super conservative, but I'm mindful of the events I go to.

There's a way of being creative and outside the box without being too crazy.

I'll wear flat sandals, but not dressy flats—I own maybe one pair.

NIGHT LIGHTS

FOR MORE THAN 50 YEARS, the Charles Hayden Planetarium at the Museum of Science has drawn starry-eyed crowds, but recently it's looked a little worn. Now, one year and $9 million in renovations later, the Planetarium reopens as "the most technologically advanced digital theater" in New England. Undiscovered Worlds: The Search Beyond Our Sun, an original show, marks the event, and will explore the relationship between our solar system and the many others that have recently come to our attention via the Kepler Telescope. In coming months, the Planetarium promises musical performances and live theater, so it won't be all reclining chairs and projection. CASEY PRUSHER

Need to vent?

If everyone kept their feelings bottled up like warm beer, we'd soon have antisocial behavior exploding all over the place and ruining the upholstery.

So send us your letters of love and spleen, and we'll print them for the world to see!

Buck Wild Getting into Harvard once is tough enough, but Bucky Fuller managed to get in twice... only to be shown the door soon after. The life of the quirky, Milton-born engineer is profiled in the American Repertory Theater's R. Buckminster Fuller: The History (and Mystery) of the Universe, through Feb. 5 at the Loeb Drama Center. The inventor of the geodesic dome (think Epcot) may not be a household name like Einstein, but that doesn't mean he hasn't made an impact. Of course, all the scientific ramblings might have you asking, "What the Buck?" Kathleen Godbold

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Blue Valentine ★★★★ The ghost of John Cassavetes looms large over writer/director Derek Cianfrance's second feature. Blue Valentine is a vicious little number, charting the courtship and dissolution of a marriage, often in alternating scenes. Whiplashing from the dizzying heights of adolescent infatuation back to middle-age sadness, the movie somehow captures both the euphoria of attraction and the hellish claustrophobia of a failed relationship. It's exasperating, infuriating and something very special. Ryan Gosling stars as Dean, a swaggering bad-boy who likes to drink beer for breakfast but really has a heart of gold. The only person in the world who sees this is Michelle Williams' Cindy, a local girl who's been around the block a few times. The connection between Dean and Cindy is at first electric, then deadening. Though sometimes too schematic in its construction, the movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam until there's nothing left but hurt. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square, West Newton Cinema and in the suburbs.)

The Company Men ★★ Acclaimed TV director John Wells' feature debut deals with the plight of downsized business execs, but with around 10 percent of the country out of work, it's tough to feel torn up about Ben Affleck having to sell his Porsche. Despite the contributions of brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins, The Company Men has a distinctly small-screen sensibility, often feeling like an entire season of one of Wells' polished dramas (ER, The West Wing) whittled down to feature length. It also feels inauthentic, a combination of talking points and statistics missing the grace notes of real-life experience. Adding to the ersatz pallor is Hollywood's recent, unfortunate affinity for terrible Boston accents. Like an English drawing-room drama spoken in Cockney slang, The Company Men's moneyed, white-collar MBA's all drop their R's and bellow profanity like extras from The Fighter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Dilemma ★★ What's a nice guy like Ron Howard doing directing a movie like this? Vince Vaughn's latest misjudged comedy resembles his shockingly bitter 2006 rom-com The Break-Up, as both the darkness of the performer and the material clang against banal sitcom trappings. Vaughn stars as a recovering gambling addict who discovers that his best friend/business partner (Kevin James, the TV actor with no place on the big screen) is being cuckolded by his cheerfully vindictive wife (Winona Ryder). There's plenty of fodder for dark farce here, as Vaughn and Ryder rip into each other with an aggression that seems to terrify director Opie, still incapable of helming any confrontation that doesn't end in a group hug. Howard backs away time and again from the material's ugly undercurrents, resorting to lame slapstick, goofy music cues and James' fat-guy dance moves. The tonal incoherence stretches to include a deeply moving, deadly serious performance from Jennifer Connelly that seems beamed in from another picture. This one is all over the map. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Green Hornet ★★ ½ Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind director Michel Gondry has such a gentle sense of whimsy that the idea of him directing one of Seth Rogen's potty-mouthed, blowhard vehicles doesn't quite compute. Add the studio mandates of a big-budget superhero franchise and you get a scattered and schizophrenic experience. Gondry's fondness for antiquated technologies and visual curlicues don't mesh with writer/star Rogen's swaggering

DARKEST DAZE

Life isn't Biutiful for Javier Bardem's sullen ghost-whisperer.

Biutiful ★½
Starring Javier Bardem, Maricel Álvarez, Eduard Fernández, Diaryatou Daff and Cheng Tai Shen. Written by Alejandro González Iñárritu, Armando Bo and Nicolás Giacobone. Directed by Alejandro González Iñárritu. At Kendall Square.

AT WHAT POINT DOES relentless misery become inadvertently hilarious?

There's a great running gag on this season of 30 Rock, in which Tracy Morgan's loose-cannon comedian signs on to star in a grim indie movie about life in the ghetto (dubbed Hard to Watch) because he wants to win an Oscar. I thought a lot about Hard to Watch while enduring Biutiful, the latest slog through multicultural suffering directed by Alejandro González Iñárritu.

Iñárritu made a dazzling debut in 2000 with Amores Perros, three interlocking tales of heartbreak and street crime in Mexico City linked together by a couple of unfortunate dogs. The film's title translates to "Love's a Bitch," displaying a wicked sense of humor that disappeared from his work almost immediately thereafter. Iñárritu subsequently collaborated with his Perros screenwriter Guillermo Arriaga on 21 Grams and Babel, two increasingly overwrought, time-twisting melodramas that prove the law of diminishing returns.

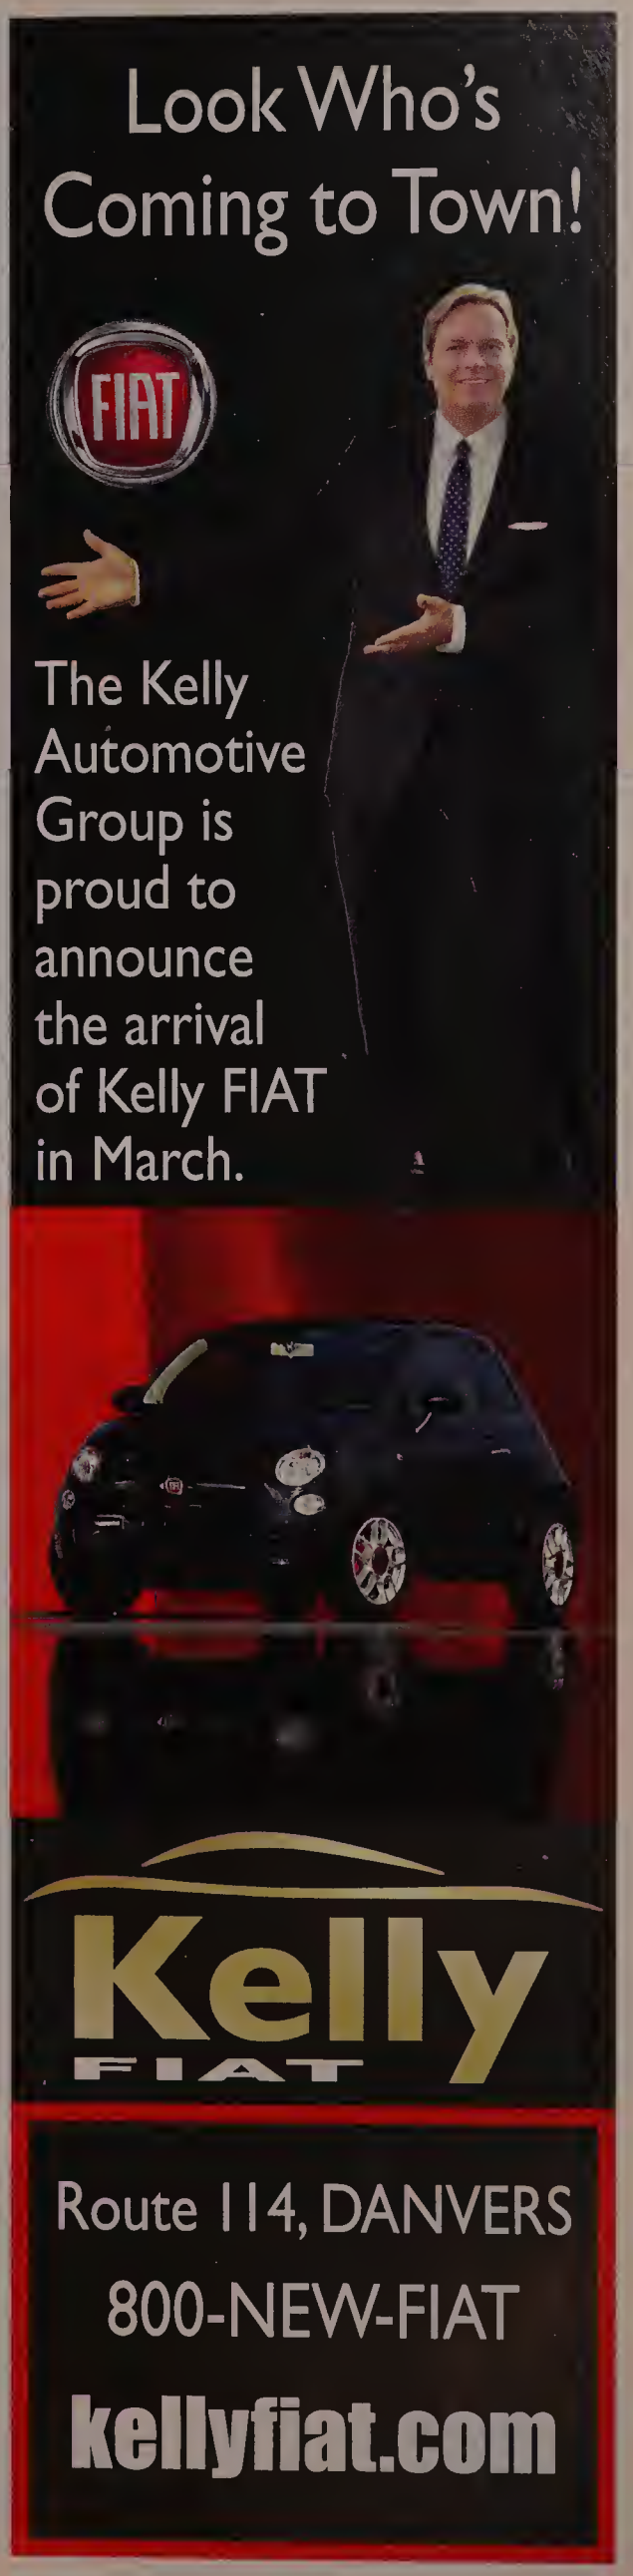
Despite an incredible eye for composition and the ability to elicit excellent performances from his actors, Iñárritu has no idea how to modulate the tone of a movie beyond a single note of resounding dread. I'd hoped his much-publicized falling out with Arriaga might have loosened the filmmaker up a bit, allowing him to try a few different colors on his palette, or maybe even crack a joke. Alas, Biutiful is even more miserable than his previous pictures. It makes the ponderous Babel seem like a lighthearted romp.

Javier Bardem stars as Uxbal, a two-bit hustler trying to get by on the ugly side of Barcelona. He works as a middleman, setting up illegal immigrants in the business of knockoff handbags, either selling them on street corners or laboring in an underground sweatshop owned by a couple of creepy guys (who periodically have graphic sex for no other reason than to make the audience uncomfortable). Uxbal runs interference, paying off cops and trying to convince himself that he's not exploiting these poor, downtrodden folks.

He's skirting the edge of the poverty line, trying to rescue his kids from their abusive, bipolar mother, played here with no small amount of caterwauling by Maricel Álvarez. She's a part-time hooker who's sleeping with Uxbal's sleazy brother; that is, when she's not busy slapping around the children and doling out heaps of vicious psychological abuse.

Uxbal also happens to be dying of prostate cancer, so massive portions of the movie are devoted to him urinating blood. Had Iñárritu cut half the shots of Javier Bardem wincing over the toilet, Biutiful could've clocked in at a more reasonable length.

Instead, it plods on for a full two and a half hours, following this hapless grifter through scenarios that inevitably escalate from bad to worse to outlandishly awful. And because what the picture really needed was more anguish and sorrow, Uxbal can also communicate with the dead. Dropping in a bizarre note of magic for no discernible reason, Biutiful has our hero hanging out at morgues to help the dead "along their way."



There's nothing wrong with bleak or depressing movies—in fact, most of my favorites are films my mother could never sit through. There's also nothing wrong with a filmmaker putting you through the emotional wringer, as long as there's good reason. Biutiful feels exploitative and crass. There's not much to it besides the unenlightening observation that life can really suck sometimes. Iñárritu is retracing the same steps he's been circling since Amores Perros, and his fetish for suffering is starting to feel more perverse than artful.

> The movie's self-important commitment to unyielding despair had finally become a joke.

It's a shame, as he's got incredible skills behind the camera and a leading man who's willing to follow him anywhere. By this point it feels redundant to call Javier Bardem brilliant. The guy is the greatest living actor not named Daniel Day-Lewis. With his hangdog eyes and stooped posture, Bardem heroically shoulders Uxbal's burdens, mustering up empathy that the screenplay can't be bothered to provide.

But to what end? What's being communicated here? By the time the bodies of dead women and children began washing up on a Barcelona beach, I couldn't take it anymore and let out an inappropriate giggle. The movie's self-important commitment to unyielding despair had finally become a joke, and there was still an hour to go. As a screenwriter friend of mine always says, "If you don't offer your audience moments of comic relief, they'll come up with their own."

30 Rock should have Iñárritu guest star—as the director of Hard to Watch. ×××

Irish Chaser

In Hot Water Only in the movies does being wanted by gangsters seem like a good time. Such is the case in Perrier's Bounty, an Irish crime-thriller/comedy starring Cillian Murphy as a perpetual waster who winds up indebted to Darren Perrier, Dublin's biggest thug. Facing a giant bounty on his head, he takes off across the city with his estranged father and love interest, outsmarting Perrier's goons at every turn. Copresented with the Irish Film Festival, the film plays in ArtsEmerson's Bright Family Screening Room on Feb. 12.

frat-boy bravado. Disparate sensibilities clash all over the place in this notoriously troubled production about a slovenly spoiled heir who takes up costumed crime-fighting on a lark, thanks mostly to his hypercompetent assistant, Kato (Jay Chou). The idea of a jackass masked crusader is a welcome one in this era of solemn superhero epics, but this rather amusing movie feels assembled at odd angles, with a lot of clever comic conceits that never quite work together. Yet, The Green Hornet is also oddly endearing at the end. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★
Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of J.K. Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins midspeech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (In the suburbs.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

No Strings Attached ★★ Natalie Portman and charisma vacuum Ashton Kutcher star in this raunchy romantic comedy that wonders if two friends can sleep together without falling in love. An interesting question, but not one that applies to Elizabeth Meriwether's screenplay, as these two crazy kids are obviously in love from the very first frames, and there's absolutely nothing keeping them apart except the annoying demands of the movie's premise. A shame, as director Ivan Reitman has assembled a killer supporting cast to steal every scene that isn't nailed down. Greenberg's Greta Gerwig and local Office gal Mindy Kaling deserve a movie of their own as Portman's sassy roommates. Kevin Kline is hysterical as Kutcher's lothario father, a vain TV star with a fondness for younger women and Lil' Wayne. Even the tiniest parts are fleshed out by pros like Olivia Thirlby, Abby Elliott and Ludacris. Alas, these stars swirl around the black hole that is Kutcher and Portman, tediously stalling for time before the movie finally arrives at its foregone conclusion. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rabbit Hole ★★★★ Grief is so much messier and confusing than most movies allow. The miracle of this small, revealing and surprisingly funny gem from director John Cameron Mitchell is that the story begins long after most pictures would've rolled the credits. It's been nine months since a suburban couple (strikingly well-played by Nicole Kidman and Aaron Eckhart) lost their four-year-old son in a car accident. Based on an off-Broadway play by David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole is primarily concerned with questions about moving on, how soon is too soon and can things ever go back to any semblance of normal? As evidenced in his Hedwig and the Angry Inch and triumphant Shortbus, Mitchell is a filmmaker who genuinely likes people, a much scarcer trait than you might imagine. Deeply compassionate and attuned to the odd, amusing moments that sometimes erupt during emotional anguish, Rabbit Hole feels awkward and real, accepting that there are no easy answers. (In the suburbs.)

Season of the Witch ★ ½ Not even one of those so-bad-it's-fun Nicolas Cage movies, this film is so bad it's just boring. Cage stars as a knight of the Crusades who suddenly decides he's tired of killing. Ensnared by the church into transporting a witch to trial, he and partner Ron Pearlman spend an ungodly amount of time on an arduous journey through a poorly lit forest, getting their minds messed with by this feral woman (Claire Foy). There's a whiff of scholarship in the early parts of Bragi F. Schut's screenplay, hopping mad at the way allegations of witchcraft were routinely used by power-hungry religious figures to persecute freethinking women. But this isn't The Crucible, it's a stupid action movie. All the possible allegories quickly take a backseat to a silly CGI demon trying to get his claws on a missing chapter of the Bible. Cage phones it in, leaving aside his patented over-the-top affectations to let his hair extensions do the acting for him. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (In the suburbs.)

Somewhere ★★ Nobody does ennui like Sofia Coppola. Amid her plush, often absurdly luxurious hotel-scapes lurks a deep-seated unease. All the soft-focus photography and designer fashions can't disguise the gnawing loneliness that haunts her characters as they sleepwalk through empty lives. Sadly, after only four films this is starting to feel a little routine. Wandering around for a few days with a hollowed-out action-movie hero (Stephen Dorff) as he chases skirts, glad-hands reporters and barely connects with his estranged daughter (Elle Fanning), Somewhere feels like a regurgitation of Coppola's greatest hits. There's a wonderful sense of isolation and little else. Dorff falls asleep at strip shows, avoids his exes and can't quite muster up any understanding of his child's needs. Falling back on that gorgeous atmosphere, Coppola's movie ends up as stunted as its protagonist. This is the first 10 minutes of Lost in Translation stretched out for two hours, and Stephen Dorff is no Bill Murray. (In the suburbs.)

Tron: Legacy ★★ Visually dazzling and otherwise inert, the sequel nobody asked for to a 29-year-old movie nobody liked displays all the perils of blockbuster franchise filmmaking with very few of the pleasures. Charisma-free Garrett Hedlund stars as the son of Jeff Bridges' legendary computer hacker, who enters the neon-drenched "grid" to rescue his long-lost dad. The kitschy charm of the original Tron was its vision of life inside computers, a perpetual video game with vaguely prophetic hints at the cyberworld to come. But Tron: Legacy is too busy setting up sequels and spin-offs to even bother addressing the Internet. It's all expository gobbledygook, devoid of personality or pep. Bridges amusingly riffs on his "Dude" persona, but his computer-generated counterpart, a de-aged villain named Clu, is a shoddy special effect. Best to kick back and enjoy the subtle, unobtrusive 3-D and director Joseph Kosinski's startling widescreen compositions, which offer deft arrangements of horizontal and vertical lines within the frame. Lovely eye candy, the rest is gibberish. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her Pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured, absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

MONSTER MASH

Girl Talk splices other artists' songs into one wild party mix.

Girl Talk plays the House of Blues on Feb. 26.

Andrew Strasser

THE MUSIC EMANATES from a crowded stage. The guitars from Black Sabbath's "War Pigs" howl while Ludacris raps "Get out the way, bitch" in perfect sync. Missy Elliot gets her freak on over a Ramones riff. Busta Rhymes bridges Radiohead and Prince, and Lady Gaga coos about a "disco stick" in step with the Beastie Boys over Iggy Pop's driving "Lust for Life" groove.

But only one performer commands the stage. Flanked by a mob of dancing fans that sweat out his kaleidoscopic pop collages under a blitz of lights, balloons, confetti and toilet paper, Girl Talk (the nom de plume of mashup maestro Gregg Gillis) welcomes fans to his party-hearty world.

The Pittsburgh native blends all those artists on his latest album, All Day, a free download composed from 373 samples. When performing live, the ex-biomedical engineer keeps tweaking as he triggers loops by hand on a laptop covered in plastic wrap to protect it from the chaos he's kindled.

"Every part of this whole project has been an experiment," says Gillis, 29. "How far can it go, both musically and in terms of the shows and the size of it? There's no clear precedent."

In eight years, Gillis has gone from underground renegade to high-profile pied piper. He began performing his mixes at small bars and art galleries. Now he's headlining giant clubs that include Lupo's in Providence on Feb. 25 and Boston's House of Blues on the following night. Until recently, Gillis invited anyone onstage, but now he lets his crew cherry-pick his posse to leverage some control.

In terms of legal precedent, Gillis bypasses the usual practice of paying other artists for their sampled work. So many samples could cost him a fortune. Though he cites a fair-use accommodation in U.S. copyright law for transformative work, Gillis hasn't had to argue his case because no artists have challenged him.

"Every part of this whole project has been an experiment."

"I don't think it's shocking to people anymore," he says. "The idea of intellectual property is gradually shifting."

It's not like Gillis hides the hooks of megahits by Beyoncé, U2, John Lennon or Lil' Wayne. But he delights in juxtaposing disparate elements, like layering bawdy hip-hop chants over classic rock and synth-pop. "To make it transformative, it's about taking a song that everyone knows and creating a different mood," he says. "[And] taking two pieces of music that seem like they're from different worlds and finding some common ground."

Gillis uses AudioMulch software to help sync samples and he occasionally alters the sound or speed of beats and vocals. But around the time of his 2006 release, Night Ripper, he opted to create mixes with minimal processing. "I thought this would sound really cool if this was a cut-and-paste exercise," he says. "If you never heard these songs before, it would just sound like some weird-ass band."

Soon after All Day's Nov. 15 release, breakdowns of its samples popped up across the Internet. One great way to experience the album is a rolling grid at Mashupbreakdown.com that names the artists, block-by-block, as the tracks play. "That's really cool," Gillis says. "I'm working with other people's material and people are taking what I worked on and they can build on it."

In his youth, Gillis enjoyed noise-rock, from Merzbow to Nirvana, and started making music in avant-garde electronic circles where his dance-pop fodder wasn't embraced. "This project has always been about embracing pop music and sort of ushering it to places where it might be confrontational," he says. "It seemed somewhat appropriate for this to have an audience outside of that scene."

It's an audience that's less analytical and more animated than average. "A lot of people just know this as something to get drunk to," he says from a Houston tour stop. "I'll spend two and a half years putting these records together and labor over the transitions and the level of detail that goes into all of it. To me, there's definitely an art to it—and a craft. And if people kind of miss that aspect, it's all good. It's almost like a compliment."

In turn, Gillis plays the cheerleading rock star, stripping off his shirt and bopping wildly around his laptop. "I want it to be less like a standard electronic show and more like a spectacle," he says, "where you feel like you're at a Bon Jovi show." ✖✖✖

Coffeehouse Rock

Vest Man The mysterious voice behind Grey's Anatomy's dreamy "Winter" has returned. But something isn't quite the same. Joshua Radin trades his signature melancholy ballads for more upbeat, catchy tunes on his new album, The Rock and Tide. Don't worry, romantics: Radin's voice is still haunting. But now it's paired with vibrant melodies that are more likely to get you up and dancing than send you to the Land of Nod. Over his seven-year music career, Radin has melted hearts with songs that have appeared on the soundtracks of more than 75 films and TV shows. Catch his revved-up sound at the House of Blues on Feb. 12. It may just set you aflutter. Amanda Warren

Dotted Eyes

Kinetic Genetics Painter John Dempcy creates works as appropriate for a biology lab as for an art gallery. Wild Type, his current show at the Walker Contemporary, is inspired by cellular structure. He applies drops of acrylic paint to canvas and crafts them until they seem to come alive, calling into question order, chaos, nature and human intervention. Stop in before Feb. 12 to see the abstract paintings morph and mutate before your eyes.

Tell-Tale Heart

Valentine's Day brings hearts of all types and sizes: edible, paper and sometimes even broken. Of course, an actual broken heart is no romantic matter. In Open Heart, David K.C. Cooper tells the story of the pioneers of pulmonary surgery. A doctor himself, he uses personal experiences, interviews and an accessible narrative in his celebration of the cardiovascular. Transplant to the Harvard Coop on Feb. 2 for an open discussion of all things surgical.

TIRED OF THE ONLINE DATING GAME?

Expand Your Social, Business & Romantic Network At Dinner.

REALITY DINING by Mopsy Strange Kennedy of The Improper Bostonian
TABLE FOR EIGHT SOCIAL INTRODUCTIONS

Table for Eight replicates the way people used to meet by bringing people physically together to dine. Indeed, many members of this 20-year-old service are disillusioned on-line daters who are tired of the cat-and-clicking-mouse games of such contacts and their frequent deceptions. Table for Eight people span in age from late-20s to late-40s, with a smattering of baby boomers. Typical members have been busy cultivating their professional lives with an income averaging $73,000, perhaps figuratively married to their career but now considering the corporeal variation: 85 percent haven't been married yet and are childless.

The actual table—located at a restaurant like Sibling Rivalry, Cucci Cucci or Le Mistral—must be round, no harsh, excluding edges. This serendipity of strangers brought together has been compared to the gemütlich flavor of wedding reception dinners. You can dine with such scintillating types as physicians, lawyers, psychologists, and teachers and scientists from local prestigious universities. An initial phone interview involving 60 questions screens members and identifies interests, views and preferences.

Although friendship and networking are benefits of dining with new people, Table for Eight also boasts at least 60 engagements, that they know of, that have resulted from their restaurant get-togethers in the last five years.

Meet Boston's most attractive, interesting & eligible... at dinner!

IN WITH THE OLD

Twee Huggers

New England is nothing if not historic, but it costs Historic New England (formerly the Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities) a pretty penny to foot the bill for all 36 of the properties it oversees. Which explains its centennial gala—the first big-ticket, black-tie soirée of the year.

Held at the Fairmont Copley Plaza, cocktails were served in the oh-so-rococo Venetian Room, followed by dinner in the Oval Room, where legendary interior designer and guest of honor Bunny Williams cracked up the crowd by announcing that she felt overdressed standing in front of a giant scallop shell (think the naked redhead in the painting by Botticelli). Williams brought along some of her posh New York friends, including the über-fabulous Duane Hampton (widow of Mark and mother of Alexa—and if you don't know who they are, read a design magazine). In terms of local gentry, there were lots, including the evening's chair, Joan Berndt, Forbes rich-lister Ned Johnson and the lovely Lillie, MFA head honcho Malcolm Rogers, Gallic antiquarian Francois Badonnet and his other half, Steve St. Peter, Cambridge art collector Susan Paine, statuesque brunette Barbara Jordan, the delicious Chrissy Kazis and her main squeeze, Mitch Sayare, bowtied Brahmin Emerson Tuthill, the debonair Reed Coughlin with his stunning other half, Kate, the breathtaking Katherine Chapman and countless, equally well-shod others.

It was a perfectly elegant evening and over all too soon. But not before the opportunity to overhear the following:

"I know they have gays in Kansas. They just don't marry French people."

And:

"Preserving New England antiquities is extremely important, which is why my wife goes to Canyon Ranch so often."

If Religion's the Opiate of the Masses, What's TV?

At this point, pretty much every American subculture has been dissected on film, so why not the struggling (often for good reason) music scene of Lower Allston?

Quiet Desperation—a demented, improv TV show that airs Fridays at 11 pm on My TV and features a cast of 200 local comics, musicians and actors—held a launch party at the Fenway hangout Church, and you wouldn't think there was enough marijuana on the planet (never mind other mind-altering drugs) to produce this "alt-reality" parody. Think Jersey Shore meets SNL meets a spin-off of The Office called The Unemployable.

Steve St. Peter and Francois Badonnet at the Historic New England gala

Mehran Khaghani, Scott Matalon and Rob Potylow at the Quiet Desperation launch party

Benny Bosh, Warren Lynch and Niki Smokes at the Quiet Desperation launch party

At least a fraction of the purposefully marginal talent involved were present, like nonstop cut-up Mehran Khaghani, the hirsute Rob Potylow, chain-smoker Tom Dustin (the only American ever to win a Canadian Comedy award), the hilarious Joe Wong (who headlined at the Radio and TV Correspondents Dinner and was reportedly funnier than Joe Biden), executive producer Scott Matalon, Niki (not my real name) Smokes, tall drink of water Benny Bosh and the puckish Warren Lynch, along with more people with dreadlocks, curious facial hair and unusual piercings, all tattooed and dressed in vintage somethings topped with knit caps.

The drink of choice was cheap beer, with the hipster manqués drinking Narragansett and the old-schoolers PBR, while the smell of pot radiated from some of the guests like perfume on a five-dollar hooker.

"We should be in jail for what we're broadcasting," said one cast member. "It's the craziest shit anyone's ever seen on TV."

A bold statement, but aside from FoxNews, possibly true.

Restylane® injectable gel is versatile enough to treat a range of moderate to severe facial wrinkles and folds.

Immediate lift and volume in just the right places for smooth, natural-looking results

Restylane adds volume to help restore youthful contours and smooth away moderate to severe facial wrinkles and folds, such as the lines from your nose to the corners of your mouth (nasolabial folds).

Results last up to 18 months when you follow the Restylane Regimen[a]

Laugh lines
The area that extends from the nose to the corners of the mouth (nasolabial folds)

Marionette lines
The area that extends downward from the corners of the mouth to the jawline

Lipstick lines
The area just below the nose and above the upper lip

Corners of the mouth
The area next to the crease of the lips

[a] The Restylane Regimen is a treatment plan that involves an initial treatment using full correction and a follow-up treatment at 4.5 or nine months after the initial treatment. The Restylane Regimen has not been studied with Restylane-L.

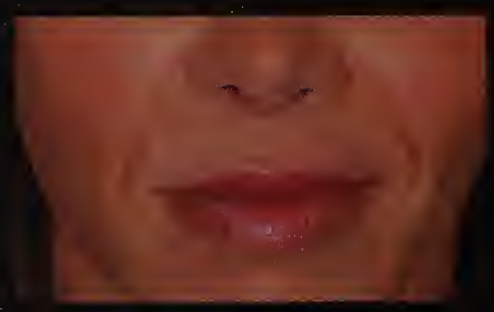
The safety or effectiveness of Restylane for the treatment of anatomic regions other than nasolabial folds have not been established in controlled clinical trials. Patients should be limited to 6.0 mL per treatment.



Get the lift you've been looking for with a more comfortable Restylane® experience

The Restylane you know and trust has been combined with a local anesthetic to help reduce discomfort. In a clinical study, Restylane-L demonstrated less discomfort at injection and up to one hour later compared to Restylane.

Find out more about Restylane-L and find a doctor at www.RestylaneUSA.com.

After 3 mL of Restylane. Individual results may vary.

The Restylane family of products includes Restylane®, Restylane-L®, Perlane®, and Perlane-L®. These products can be used individually to add volume and fullness to the skin to correct moderate to severe facial wrinkles and folds, such as the lines from your nose to the corners of your mouth (nasolabial folds). Ask your healthcare professional which is right for you.

Restylane®

Important Safety Considerations for the Restylane family of products

Products in the Restylane family should not be used by people with previous bad allergies, particularly to certain microorganisms known as gram-positive bacteria, or by people with previous bad allergies to drugs that have required in-hospital treatment. These products should not be used by people with bleeding disorders. Injections should not be made anywhere except the skin or just under the skin. Restylane-L and Perlane-L should not be used by people with a known allergy to lidocaine.

Use of products in the Restylane family at the site of skin sores, pimples, rashes, hives, cysts, or infection should be postponed until healing is complete. Use of the products in these instances could delay healing or make your skin problems worse. After your treatment, you might have some swelling, redness, pain, bruising, and tenderness. This will normally last less than seven days. In rare circumstances, the doctor may inject into a blood vessel, which can damage the skin. Although rare, red or swollen small bumps may occur. If you have had facial cold sores before, an injection can cause another outbreak. To avoid bruising and bleeding, you should not use the products if you have recently used drugs that thin your blood or prevent clotting. If you are pregnant, breastfeeding, or under 18 years, you should not use products in the Restylane family.

Patients should be limited to 6.0 mL per treatment. The safety or effectiveness of products in the Restylane family for the treatment of anatomic regions other than nasolabial folds have not been established in controlled clinical studies.

The Restylane family of products is available only through a licensed practitioner. Complete product and safety information is available at www.RestylaneUSA.com.

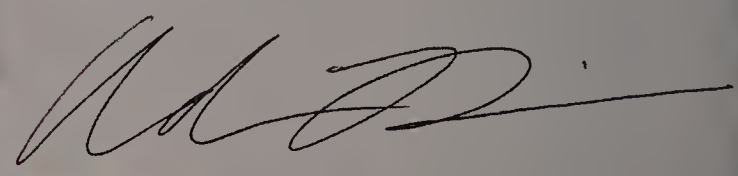
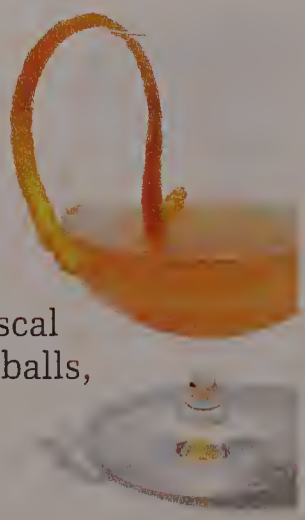
The IMPROPER

Et in Arcadia Ego



Years ago, I arrived in Cambridge with a fresh diploma under my arm and a protective shell of idiocy around my ego. Not understanding basic hygiene or architectural safety, I sublet a low-grade hovel in Inman Square—the sort where you wake up with the taste of fallen plaster in your mouth and the rats are so big they get hired as lobbyists. Let me be absolutely clear on this point: I was largely disease-free when I arrived. Only a kindly act of arson could've eased my squalor, though, and since I lived on a diet of infrequent toast and large gins, I grew envious of housecats. On warm nights, I'd stand outside in the evening drizzle, gawping at the clean light in the windows of East Coast Grill, wondering what it would be like to eat a fish.



Cambridge was, at the time, a hotbed of youthful apathy. There was a wild current of indifference affecting all the future hedge fund managers and derivatives traders graduating from our nation's top universities. You could almost taste the bored self-regard when you walked into one of the new "Irish pubs" that were beginning to sprout in the ethnic enclaves of Harvard and Porter squares. Of course, I'm viewing those years from deep within the safe, wet hole of nostalgia. The whole situation was probably much sillier.

Now I'm older and, if not wiser, more prone to fits of hysterical ranting. But to me, Cambridge will always be a place of unripe dreams, of possibility. That's why, in this issue, Nancy Gaines writes about Cambridge's latest grand ideas in research, and we explore the less-traveled neighborhoods of the city.

SEW CHIC

"I WOULDN'T BE designing the way I do if I didn't study architecture," Michael De Paulo says. Five years after receiving his master's in architecture from Northeastern, the 31-year-old is fashioning dresses with structured shapes and clean, hard lines, a look prized by clients like Linda Pizzuti Henry, who wore De Paulo for her wedding to Red Sox principal owner, John Henry. On Oscar night, Tonya Chen Mezrich, spouse of The Accidental Billionaires scribe Ben Mezrich, will walk the red carpet in a red silk taffeta mermaid gown, which will be part of De Paulo's fall 2011 collection. Says the designer, "My look is about sculptural silhouettes while still being feminine in design."

Good Eats

ON TOP OF MACCHERONCELLI

It's no small task to take on a classic, but three locals have reinterpreted the comfort food king: spaghetti and meatballs. These are dishes worth a little iconoclasm.

ELIZABETH BOMZE

Braised Pork and Veal Meatballs With Toasted Orecchiette $25
Chef/owner Steve Johnson's unorthodox, but brilliant, riff on a dish he ate years ago in Puglia swaps sauce for chicken stock and pairs fried pasta with kale, maitake mushrooms, Turkish paprika and a handful of shredded Piave cheese.

Take a Peek

Most storefront displays are trimmed with tired babydoll tunics and gimmicky graphic prints. But the smartly dressed mannequins in this Harvard Square boutique flaunt more urbane styles. Owner Annette Duclos' modish mix of work and play pieces are Anthropologie-esque (a little less boho, a little more chic). The price points can quickly max out a post-grad's fashion ration, but there are great deals during semi-annual sales. Don't forget to check the back corner for a treasure trove of high-caliber camisoles and B.ella legware. ELIZABETH BOMZE

PREP STATION

Things are cooking in Cambridge.

WITH A SPATE OF restaurants set to open outside Kendall Square in the coming months, the neighborhood looks to become the latest hot spot for dining. Among the upcoming crop: Area IV and Abigail's.

Area IV, named for its neighborhood planning designation, is owned by Michael Leviton, chef/owner of Lumière, and Michael Krupp. After the closing of their last project—Persephone—they've regrouped to create what Leviton calls "just a very simple, very casual place to eat and drink." The combination bakery/cafe/restaurant/bar will have a wood-burning oven to turn out pizzas and other fare. Leviton will cook with chef de cuisine Jeff Pond (formerly of Persephone and Lumière) when Area IV opens in late April.

FOUR SCORE
Michael Leviton

"We've got a lot of good competition heading our way," acknowledges Abigail's co-owner Sarah Murnane, who's tended bar around town and managed the Thirsty Scholar. Her partner, co-owner/chef James Ludwig (B-Side Lounge, the Independent, East Coast Grill) is working with chef de cuisine Jason Lord (East Coast Grill) on a menu featuring seasonal and local produce, as well as a raw bar. "Nothing too fancy," Murnane says. "Bistro-style, pretty low-key." Expect a May opening.

MORE NEWS: In an amicable parting, Felino Samson is leaving Pops in the South End. His replacement, Philadelphia native Amanda Howell (Russell House Tavern), will put her own spin on the menu's comfort foods.... No details yet, but we hear the South End will get a new Mexican spot—El Centro, on Shawmut Avenue—sometime this spring.

Going Out

Border Patrol

OVER THE PAST FEW months, Boston's taste for Spanish and Latin American food has led to new venues appearing all over the city. When word spread that Michael Schlow would open a tequila and tapas bar in the former Cottonwood Café space, curiosity piqued. But Schlow is quick to set the record straight. "Yes, we have small plates. Yes, there are a lot of Latin American and Spanish influences, but first and foremost we are an American restaurant," he says. "People are quick to judge. This is definitely not a tapas bar."

At Tico, the food draws on Latin American and Spanish flavor profiles, but it doesn't try to be authentic or traditional. "People told me that this kind of food doesn't do well in New England," Schlow says. "But I was cooking with these flavors at home for guests, and I saw how well it was received." Schlow took inspiration for his new venture from trips to Spain and Mexico, where he relished the chance to try local cuisine from small villages.

Like the dishes, the ambience is a creative translation. Mismatched chairs from Mexico and gothic pendant lamps from Spain anchor the bar. Columns are covered with Spanish advertisements. Rolling translucent panels divide the restaurant and sport abstract photography by Christian Boyd, allowing for privacy without shading the space.

The many tequilas lined up behind the bar are certainly on trend, but they aren't news to Schlow. "Opening Tico has allowed me to learn more about it, but I've been interested in tequila for years. That's the icing on the cake for me."

Schlow has built his career around elevating everyday food; despite lots of competition, the Radius burger remains near the top of the ground-beef heap. He's now added a signature burger to Via Matta's menu, and fanfare may continue when enthusiasts sample Tico's model. Covered in cheddar and piled with bacon, it's a sandwich true to the restaurant, not to preconceived notions. "There isn't any guacamole or salsa on it. This isn't that kind of place."

KYLE WRIGHT

ONCE BITTEN

TO MELISSA MOORE-HOUSE, SNAKE OWNER: I'm outraged that the escaped-boa-constrictor-on-the-MBTA debacle turned into a heartwarming reunion on TV. You were worried that it would escape into an unsuspecting rider's bag, and crying that someone might harm it. Seriously? That reptile could've easily slithered into a baby carriage and strangled a child—it hadn't eaten for weeks! You should be fined for public safety violations and—at the very least—be restricted from taking that creature out in public without a restraint. If there are no rules protecting the public from dangerous exotic pets, there should be. I've lived here for three years, often riding the T. Never again. Hissed off

To my least-favorite bookstore:

Instead of having a greeter stand at the door with a goofy smile, perhaps he could assist by directing me through this labyrinth of horse calendars to find the book I'm looking for when it's not alphabetized by author name. The search kiosk offers no more help than a "most likely in-store" response. Bigfoot or Amelia Earhart could "likely" be in-store! Fitting that the franchise is on the verge of bankruptcy. The closest it is to finding a book is Chapter 11.

Novel idea

To the MBTA:

I'd like to know why a group of us were waiting for more than 30 minutes for a #77, #79 or #350 bus on Feb. 3. When the driver finally did arrive, he complained how he had been working since 5 am. He wasn't the one with frostbitten fingers and toes. Chilly deposition

Drink of the Moment

UP IN SMOKE

When Daniel Motsinger left his post as sommelier at Radius, he set out to conquer the wilder cocktail frontier. Unlike wines, which are chosen for specific flavor profiles, he views cocktail mixing as more experimental. "You have to be open to what happens," he says. Although he's known for his tequila drinks, Motsinger enjoys mixing other agave-based spirits to create the unexpected. Mescal, he says, is the only liquor that enhances mood and energy.

Hence the SMOKE MONSTER ($11). Although the name's not a reference to Lost, the bar does benefit from Hollywood's influence. "At this bar, sports don't generate excitement. It's all about movies," Motsinger says, adding that the Smoke Monster is popular with patrons of the nearby Kendall Square Cinema.

The Smoke Monster's plot develops in stages. On the nose, the lightly oaked and fresh agave smell of blanco tequila dominates, mixing with fresh grapefruit to produce a vibrant citrus scent. Upon first sip, though, the mescal's smoky, peaty flavor surprises. Next, subtle notes of honey lend sweetness. The final sips offer a tart, citrus crescendo that resolves the drink's loose ends. Motsinger persuaded a skeptic at the bar to taste the drink despite his aversion to tequila. The customer noted, "I like it. But I don't like that I like it." Spoiler alert: He drank happily ever after. LINDSEY CANANT

Bound to Succeed

THE CREEL DEAL

Gavin Creel is a Broadway star and recording artist best known for his roles in La Cage aux Folles, Thoroughly Modern Millie and, most recently, Hair. The Tony-nominated actor stars in American Repertory Theater's musical spin on Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound, opening Feb. 25 at Oberon.

Oberon is a small venue. What can the audience expect from such an intimate setting?

This is actually my favorite kind of setting. I perform out a lot with my original music, so I'm used to being in jazz clubs or cabarets. A bar, a good sound system. It's all you need! Diane Paulus says that it's the "theater space of tomorrow," and I see it. I'm just excited.

Serj Tankian (of System of a Down) and Steven Sater provided the score for the show. Safe to assume this is going to be a lot different from your past works?

When people ask me what to expect, I just say, "It's going to be loud." It's unapologetic in its style with pop and rock music and punk, with stunning choral arrangements. We're trying to honor Aeschylus' work and the Greek traditions wherever we can, but it has the flavor of a low ceiling, basement rock club. It's like you found this place.

You first worked with Diane Paulus on Hair, and now you're back for Prometheus Bound. What keeps you returning to work with her?

I was working on a reading of Pippin, and she mentioned Prometheus to me. I took it on faith because I trust her completely. She's got her finger on commercial theater and wants to challenge what people think. Working with her is fun and scary. It's all about the norm versus the new.

Are you looking forward to anything in particular now that you'll be living in Cambridge?

I heard that there's a museum filled with little glass boxes filled with flowers and bugs. I really can't wait to see that.

A little cream blush goes a long way. When strategically placed (swept from the apples of your cheeks to just below your temples), the right color can enliven your face and leave you with a fresh, youthful look. These three tints double as lip stains, so you won't need much else.

JUST DOUBT IT

The hard facts on incredulity

DAVID H. FREEDMAN brings a muckraking skepticism to the ideas of "expert" advice and blazing scientific "truths." Although we're endlessly bombarded with new discoveries, many are seriously compromised. Scientists may ignore contradictory findings in favor of flashy breakthroughs that bring them acclaim, and their subordinates, out of professional self-interest, may suppress information that undermines the desired results. Much-touted discoveries can go dangerously south later on. For example, scientists used to claim that hormone replacement therapy for menopause reduces the risk of heart disease. It was subsequently found to increase it.

Wrong: Why Experts Keep Failing Us—and How to Know When Not to Trust Them
By David H. Freedman

Freedman is a local journalist.

Freedman discusses how now-blushing experts declared sunny economic skies before the financial meltdown of 2008. Also, statistical averages, whatever their general meaning, may have no useful application to your own life. Even Google CEO Eric Schmidt says that the Internet is a potential "cesspool" of lies and misinformation. Likewise, the wisdom of celebrity gurus requires a tablespoon of salt. Freedman, ever doubtful, tips his hat to large controlled studies, to any findings that are "heavy on qualifying statements" or that respect refutation.

Plus, he's willing to admit that his own proclamations warrant the same skepticism to which he subscribes. ✖✖✖

FROM PAGE 89: "Just one problem: the general effectiveness of groups, teamwork, collaboration, and consensus is largely a myth. Crowds, far from being reliably wise, turn out to be at least as good at discouraging and suppressing the production and dissemination of excellent work as highlighting it, and tend to bring some of the worst work to the top. Not only do group effects usually fail to protect us from flawed expertise but they introduce entirely new kinds of defects above and beyond what experts inflict on us."

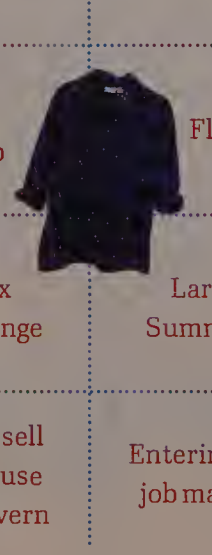
Wine

GREAT WHITES FOR A WINTER THAW

White wine season will be back. It may not seem like it now, but it's bound to happen. So why not experiment with some high-quality, underdog varieties, with which you can wow your friends and make a personal statement?

The keys to quality in these three winners are hand harvesting from old vines, infertile soils, minimal intervention in the natural process and limited production.

LUIGI FERRANDO ERBALUCE DI CALUSO PIEDMONT, ITALY, 2009 (Available by order). This is one of those secret heirloom grapes the Italians unleash upon the jaded palates of the world every so often. Originating in the Alpine foothills of northern Piedmont, the name erbaluce relates to the grapes' copper-pink appearance in the autumn sunlight. Floral in aroma, with hints of apple and tropical fruit, this wine has bright acidity and a tight core of underlying mineral flavors that make it a natural with scallops and shrimp.



DOMAINE DE VILLAINE ALIGOTÉ BOUZERON, FRANCE, 2009 ($25, Formaggio Kitchen, Cambridge). De Villaine makes the Rolls-Royce of aligoté. The grape used to be grown all over Burgundy, but it can turn into nasty swill unless it's handled properly. Owned by the man who runs the greatest pinot noir estate in the world (Romanée-Conti), Villaine makes an aligoté from organically grown grapes that's fresh and lemony with silky, apple-like, soft-spice undertones. Since 2009 was such a ripe year, this wine has more flesh and roundness than any I've ever tasted. Enjoy with lobster and crab.

DONELAN FAMILY "VENUS" SONOMA, 2008 ($63, Urban Grape, Newton). Made mostly from the northern Rhône roussanne grape with a touch of viognier mixed in for aroma, this wine is amazingly rich but low in alcohol (12.1 percent). With a waxy, herbal, lanolin fragrance and creamy, anise-like, subtle fruit flavors, Venus finishes on a long vanilla-bean spice note. This superconcentrated white will warm you up and pair beautifully with earthy dishes and slow-cooked stews.

Brookline harbors a hidden gem.

TOAST TO THE ROAST The odds of success are stacked in Cognac's favor.

NELSON COGNAC'S GOOD fortune to share his surname with France's celebrated distillate finds expression in his new Brookline bistro. Cognac, housed in a small building on Harvard Street, surprises and delights. With simple design and decor, enlivened by colorful posters advertising various brands of Cognac, its seven-seat oyster bar and 31-seat dining room furnish an appropriate venue for imaginatively conceived and well-prepared food at reasonable prices. With Kouzina, the Mediterranean-themed restaurant run by Cognac and his wife in Waban, the couple now owns two of our area's hidden gems.

Dinner began with crusty baguettes from Brookline's Clear Flour Bakery accompanied by rich French butter. A half dozen Connecticut Blue Point oysters on the half shell (at a special price of $1 each) hit the spot one evening. Impeccably fresh, their natural flavor needed no help from an accompanying shallot mignonette. Fried Ipswich clams ($12) arrived hot and crispy, tenderer and less chewy than the South Shore clams more often encountered in area restaurants. A small ramekin of mussels "escargot" ($11) came thoroughly doused in garlicky parsley butter, an imaginative channeling of classic Burgundian snails. The only disappointment over two visits was the steak tartare ($13), a bland preparation in need of herbs or some other zesty element. It prompted me to lament, "Where are the capers?" rather than "Where's the beef?"

From the restaurant's varied menu of about two dozen items, we chose a pasta course to sample between the appetizers and mains. The seafood fregola ($14) was a splendid combination of Sardinian large-grained couscous and crab, mussels and baby octopus in a broth redolent of fennel, tomatoes, saffron and a hint of Parmesan. With that, the stage was set for three first-rate meat dishes. The lamb shank ($21) had been braised to fall-off-the-bone tenderness in Harpoon Winter Lager, and the ragout rendered from its juices dressed remarkably light, delicate gnocchi. Grilled hanger steak ($22), accompanied by a mountain of fresh, well-herbed frites, had a coarse but juicy texture and full flavor. It left my devoutly carnivorous dining companion well-satisfied.

Finally, with the roasted half chicken ($18)—my mandatory benchmark for bistro kitchens—Cognac scored a perfect 10 on ingredients and flavor. Its skin was an ideally crisp, golden brown, while the accompaniments shone: vibrantly fresh haricots verts and a velvety smooth potato puree, luxuriously enriched with garlicky butter. Unfortunately, the dish stumbled on presentation, with its magnificent components layered one on top of the other (the hapless beans dividing the potato from the chicken). A Parisian bistro chef would recoil in horror at turning such a dish into a soupy stew.

Mini-desserts ($3 each) featured a rich chocolate fondue, moist, fruit-accented bread pudding and an excellent crème brûlée. Value-priced beverages to accompany Cognac's wonderful food included an elegant Harpoon Belgian ale ($4 a draft) and a perfect 2008 Bouchard Pere & Fils Burgundy ($32), its classic pinot noir character, bouquet and elegant finish worthy of a wine of a much higher price and pedigree.

Informed, friendly service—with the chef occasionally bringing out a course—made us feel like the honored guests of a gracious host. This spot deserves a button on the speed dial of all serious Boston foodies. ★★★

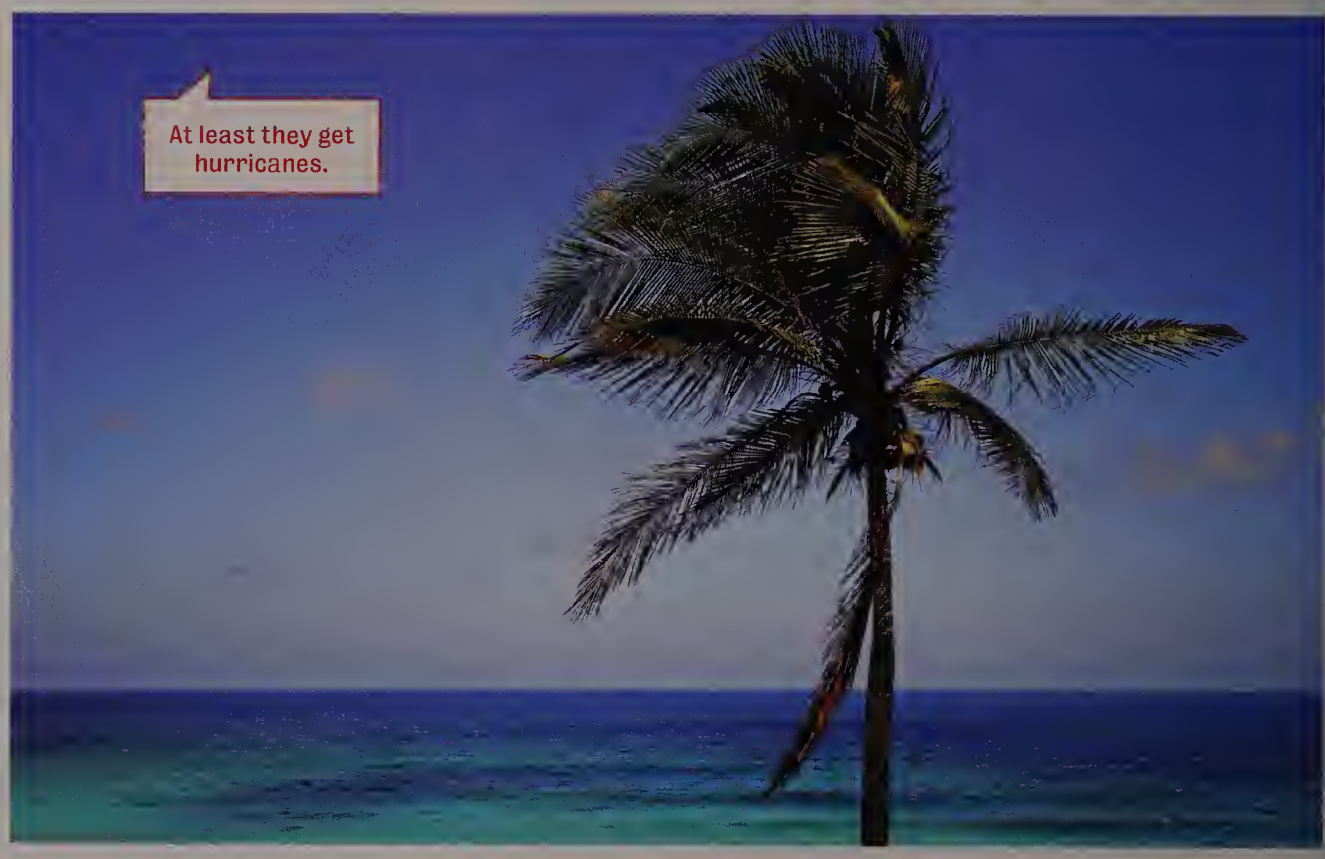
JEALOUS MUCH?

I need to scale back the crippling envy.

Read more at improper.com/blogs

WE TAKE JEALOUSY for granted. It's such an integral part of human nature, in ways big and small, that we don't really think much about it. Someone snakes a parking spot right in front of your building: jealousy. You see an ugly guy dating a chick who's a nine: jealousy. You read that unfunny ventriloquist Jeff Dunham made $30 million last year: blind rage. And also, jealousy.



Now, I'm not complaining. Relative to most people who've ever lived, I've got an unimaginably great life. For instance, I've never even had a cavity. But if I did, I could get anesthesia while it was filled, an option unavailable to even the richest Babylonian, or a contemporary British person. Yet my own good fortune doesn't mean I can't be jealous. After all, without jealousy, Shaq might still be a Laker and Rock of Love would have no premise.

But I've noticed that, lately, my jealousy seems to be strengthening in unreasonable ways. Every time I see an ad for The Social Network, I become gripped with a powerful and unreasonable envy toward Mark Zuckerberg. Which really makes no sense at all.

I think my Zuckerberg envy is rooted in the fact that no other entrepreneur on the planet has become so rich for doing so little. He had one good idea, and now he's worth billions of dollars. I've always considered Mark Cuban to be the poster boy for "rich beyond proportion of actual accomplishments," but Mark Zuckerberg could afford to buy Mark Cuban and rename him Mark Zuckerberg Jr. just for sport.

However, I'm neither a computer programmer nor an entrepreneur. So envying the founder of Facebook is as pointless as envying people from the future. Incidentally, I also envy people from the future.

Think of the crap we have to put up with that future people won't. Right now, we're saddled with cars that don't fly, skateboards that don't hover and a men's fashion scene that continues to resist the double necktie. So thanks, Back to the Future Part II. Thanks for predicting a bunch of cool stuff that didn't actually happen, except for cell phones, awesome TVs and Major League Baseball in Florida. I suppose I could watch Back to the Future Part III and feel superior to people who lived in the Wild West, but the Wild West always looks like a lot of fun. There's a documentary about it that I recommend called The Three Amigos.

You should have plenty of time to watch it while you're waiting for your yeti mailman to deliver your copy of the New England Journal of Hypothermia on his snowmobile. Not that you should really worry about hypothermia. You'll probably have a heart attack from shoveling long before it sets in. Which brings me to the subjects of my most acute jealousy: people who live in warm places.

True, some people think winter is fun. I'm sorry, but the fact that ice fishing is an approved form of recreation proves that winter isn't fun. Not so long ago, you endured the winter only vaguely aware that people elsewhere spend January weekends playing golf beneath the blazing sun. Now, thanks to the diabolical Mark Zuckerberg, that fact is shoved in your face on a daily basis. I'm on the verge of defriending everyone who lives south of Rhode Island just so I don't have to see any more obnoxious "Today was a great beach day!" updates in the middle of February. One guy who lives in Tampa recently posted a photo of some palm trees with the caption "Feels like summer!" and for a few minutes I seriously pondered the logistics of driving 24 hours to punch someone in the face.

I myself was recently in Orlando for a couple days—where it was a balmy 55 degrees—and to avoid New Englander envy I refrained from posting any photos of myself in the hotel's lazy river. (Yes, I shivered my way around a lap of the lazy river, just on principle.) The experience might've been pleasant, actually, had some craven nine-year-old not shoved me and my floaty-tube into the middle of a fountain while I helplessly yelled, "Dude, cut it out!"

Kids can get away with that crap because they know you legally can't retaliate by dunking them until they've learned a valuable lesson about messing with a man's lazy-river time. Well, guess what, kid? I can drive a car and go buy ice cream whenever I want. I can play any video game and watch any movie. I can warm up after the lazy river by buying a drink for myself. And maybe, while I'm at it, one for your mom. You should be jealous. ✖✖✖

TOWN AND GOWN

Memories of a special city

I KNOW A LOT ABOUT CAMBRIDGE. I spent my college years there, and I thought I'd never leave. But in life, everything changes, not always for the better. We're drawn to the past, win or lose. Either we long for it, because it seemed simpler, or we obsess about it, because it caused us so much damage.

Of course, there are lots of Cambridges, many of them familiar to me at different points in my life. When I was in high school, for example, two Cambridge spots were high on our list on places to take dates. One was Richard's Drive-in Cafeteria on Memorial Drive—hamburgers and shakes. Another was Simeone's near Central Square. They had booths and pizza and seemed as exotic to us as any foreign land. If those places worked their magic with our dates, perhaps we had a chance at "BC Night School," the prime parking spot in the dark areas around the Chestnut Hill Reservoir at Cleveland Circle.

After college and the military, I rented a tiny apartment off Huron Avenue. A fancy married couple who lived nearby called to invite me for dinner. They lived in a grand house about which I could only dream.

"We want to find out what you're really like," the wife explained. "See if you'll love it here." Her husband was a few years ahead of me in school, but we had been in an organization together.

"Jeez," I thought. "Are we always going to be tested? Always on display to see if we're acceptable?" Yes, we are. So I went to the dinner dressed to the nines, with a bottle of Frascati, a delicious Roman white wine I bought for a buck in a Mount Auburn Street liquor store. The martinis flowed from grandpa's shaker. Dinner appeared on great-grandma's English china. We sipped wine from great-great-grandma's crystal, given to her by a czar. I drank too much, talked too much, couldn't see too much (as I'd forgotten my glasses). And, in telling a story, I swept my arm in a grand gesture, knocking two priceless wine goblets to the floor where they shattered into many little Russian pieces. I looked around and said to my hostess, "Now you know what I'm really like." It wasn't a good way to break into "social" Cambridge.

Academic Cambridge is a different story. In the money business the alpha male is judged only by how much money he makes. Often these people are called (or call themselves) "the big swingin' dicks." In the academic world you're judged by your reputation, your awards, your books. But at cocktail parties, almost everyone thinks no one else is really worthy. At one gathering, I heard snatches of conversations like "really a derivative thinker," "panders to the attractive females," "his cousin writes for the Times and plugs him."

At another party full of professors, journalists and government people currently out of power, I was talking to a prominent minister. "Many of these guests say they do not believe in God," he told me. "Often they don't want me around because they want to feel morally superior. I love to walk and talk among them to perhaps make them a little nervous, a little unsure." He smiled. "It makes my job in Cambridge fun. Does that sound like tragic pride?" I think it's fun, too, like dropping into a different planet once in a while.

Then there's the endless battle between town and gown. I was a member of The Harvard Lampoon, the humor magazine. There was a competition to get on board, culminating in Fool's Week, a hazing designed to humiliate the candidates. During my Fool's Week, we had to pull pranks like letting pigeons loose in Widener Library, where they flew to the ceiling and dumped on the students. We also chained shut the gates to Harvard Yard just as the libraries closed at midnight, imprisoning hundreds of people within the ivy walls.

The topper was at Christmastime, when we dressed a fool as Santa and stationed him in front of the Coop at rush hour with a bell and pot for collecting donations. After 15 minutes of ho, ho, ho, four of us other fools attacked Santa and stole his pot, which had been filling with coins. We raced off with our trophy while enraged Christmas shoppers yelled and whistled, alerting two cops, who drew their guns and gave chase. Fool Santa ended up in jail, his photo plastered on the front page of The Boston Herald. I was detained by one officer who was breathing hard from running after us, and understandably pissed off.

"Let me give you a lesson," he said. "You'll learn it eventually, and we might as well start now. Nobody likes a wiseass."

Unfortunately, these days my adventures in Cambridge are tamer. But here are a few suggestions for you: Order the crispy duck at Rialto. In the summer, eat in the garden at Harvest. Both places are great for people watching and eavesdropping. A little-known pleasure is the Peabody Museum and the attached Natural History museum. Young people are wild about the dinosaurs and dioramas.

One of my female friends gushes over the Susanna boutique on Mass. Ave.—great things for grown-up flower children and sophisticated bohos. If you're really accepted in town, Charlie Davidson at the Andover Shop on Holyoke Street will sell you something that makes you look better than you thought you could. Get Castle and Forbes shaving soap and brushes at Colonial Drug on Brattle Street. Have a private picnic at the Mount Auburn Cemetery, and bring cheeses made from your favorite Scotches from Formaggio Kitchen. They're also good eaten on the steps of the Widener Library, accompanied by a wine bottle hidden in a paper bag, so you can watch the passing scene. If you're a romantic, sit in the wicker seats in the Casablanca bar while listening to Nina Simone sing "Ah Loves You, Porgy" and sneaking small kisses.

5 SPRING TRAINING STORYLINES

Come on, Dustin Is he really still talking about this leg injury? I don't mean that in an annoyed way. I mean, I'm scared. Dustin Pedroia would rather paper cut his tongue than dwell on an injury like this, so it makes you wonder why he keeps talking about the "tougher-than-expected" recovery process. Or maybe I'm just paranoid. I did eat a batch of mushrooms before I wrote this.

Paying the Papi? I have no idea what to expect from David Ortiz this year. Do I think he has another 30/100 left in him? Yeah, sure. Would I be shocked if he hits .257 with 21 homers? Not really. I guess I'm just guardedly optimistic. But the one thing I do know for sure is that if Papi does play well, he'll want that extension. And he won't be afraid to talk about it.

BIG TIPPER Ortiz will be looking for a payday.

And Maybe Even Dice-K? Everyone's pretty confident in what Jon Lester and Clay Buchholz will bring to the table, but the question—maybe the biggest of the entire spring—is whether one of the other two guns can live up to their billing. Beckett? Lackey? Dear God, maybe even both?! The potential is huge. If everyone's on point, why can't the Sox staff rival what's going on in Philadelphia? (Now's a good time to picture Bartolo Colon in a Yankees uniform and laugh.)

Speaking of Injuries JD Drew, everybody! Honestly, after four years of this, I'm actually starting to feel a little bad for the guy. OK, that's a lie. In reality, I'm tired of the JD Drew era. He's been a very naughty robot. Forgetting to oil his hamstrings again…

And Finally Carl Crawford and Adrian Gonzalez. They're the story. They'll bring the greatest excitement. Right now, they're the reason people are so out of their minds about this season. (I'm obviously excited about Gonzalez, but I'm far more eager to see Crawford in a Red Sox uniform. That still doesn't feel real.)

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/19: Paul Pierce and Ray Allen definitely have a side bet going for the three-point contest. Probably for more than I make in a year. (I knew I should've been an NBA star.)

2/24: Carmelo to the Knicks! Carmelo to the Mavs! Carmelo to the Lakers! YELLING! It's the NBA Trade deadline. Enjoy.

2/27: The Red Sox and Twins begin the quest for the 2011 Mayor's Cup, as the rest of the world wonders: "The what?"

1 ONE INSTANT CLASSIC

It's hard to write about specific games in this column because it just ends up looking grossly out of date, but the Bruins/Canadiens classic from Feb. 9 will no doubt stand the test of two-weeks time. Anyway, here's to big hits, high scores and goalie fights. What a ridiculous game.

2 ON RAY ALLEN'S RECORD

Running Up the Score Here's what I love most about Ray stealing Reggie Miller's career three-pointers crown (aside from the fact that it inflicts pain upon Reggie): Ray isn't just going to break the record; he's going to obliterate it. By the time he's done, he'll have hundreds more than Cheryl's brother. And he'll do it all without ever breaking a sweat. Ever.

Nothing but Net This probably isn't possible (at least not for anyone with a job, family or anything else going on), but I'd love to figure out how many of Ray's 2,500+ threes have been swishes. Wouldn't you? Just for fun? Just to see how it feels? I'm saying around 75 percent. (As you say, "I don't care.")

3 Random Rants

The Commish Roger Goodell's trying to blame fans for the 18-game schedule idea. They don't like the preseason, he says, so what they want is more regular season! Of course, that's a pile of crap. Fans want two more regular season games like Rex Ryan wants a date with a foot amputee. Do the right thing, Rodge! Sweet 16.

The Good Teammate Don Cherry and Mike Milbury should be Tasered for their national takedown of Andrew Ference. Here's a guy who spent the last year watching one of his teammate's life unravel because of a cheap hit, and he's supposed to look the other way when anyone, even someone on his team, delivers one of his own? Come on guys, even Barry Melrose's mullet has more sense.

The List So, I guess it's time to take Cameron Diaz off my list. Yeah, she's a goner. And it's not even about the Super Bowl popcorn incident as much as the fact that she's still so involved with such a total douche. Oh well. Guess that just leaves Sienna Miller and Joy Behar.

"When you grow up with New England winters, there's a natural sarcasm you develop."

Soroff On NATE CORDDRY

The actor/comedian talks about kids' movies, soap operas and Tom Brady's hair.

WEYMOUTH NATIVE NATE CORDDRY, 33, known for his roles on TV shows like The Daily Show, United States of Tara and Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip, is currently starring in NBC's Harry's Law, opposite Kathy Bates. The younger brother of comedian Rob Corddry, Nate earned a bachelor's degree at Colby-Sawyer College. After training as an actor at the Williamstown Theater Festival, he joined The Daily Show in 2005 as a correspondent alongside his brother. His film work includes The Ugly Truth, The Invention of Lying and Yogi Bear. He lives in Los Angeles.

Jonathan Soroff: So you clearly got all the hair in your family...
Nate Corddry: It's the Propecia and Rogaine that's keeping it barely hanging on. It's the real high point of my day, sitting in the hair and makeup trailer and having my bald spots painted in.

Anything to say to Tom Brady about his hair?
God love you, Tom Brady! I think it looks fantastic. My girlfriend disagrees, as do a majority of Americans, but the guy's a beast.

Are all comedians angry people?
No. Most of them are broken on the inside and need positive reinforcement from dark rooms full of strangers.

Did growing up in Weymouth make you funny?
I'm not sure it's Weymouth. When you grow up with New England winters, there's a natural sarcasm you develop.

In a bare-knuckle boxing fight, would you pick Jon Stewart or Stephen Colbert?
Bare knuckles? Colbert. But if they had to follow rules and wear gloves, I'd say Jon Stewart.

Ever ruined a take by cracking up?
Maybe a thousand times. But you just go, "mother-fing c-sucker!" and then try again.

How much of what you do is improv?
On The Daily Show, a lot of it, but you don't have to improvise when the writing is really good. The only thing worse than bad improv is bad Shakespeare.

Has Kathy Bates ever tied you to a bed, put a cement block between your knees and smashed it with a sledgehammer?
Oddly enough, no. But I kind of assumed that she wouldn't do that.

Was that a casting couch situation? Did she try to have her way with you?
There was no seduction, but I'm seduced by the work that she does every single day. Groan.

You were on Guiding Light*?*
I played a computer nerd. The episode never aired, though. It got preempted by the invasion of Iraq.

Strangest thing you ever read about yourself?
My college alumni magazine did a story about me and one of my professors said I was the most pretentious student he ever had.

Yogi Bear*: What were you thinking?*
It's the exact movie they set out to make! It's not a movie for A.O. Scott. It's a movie for A.O. Scott's 7-year-old daughter. It's made something like $90 million. It's not gonna get me on Inside the Actors Studio, but it was my first big studio film. So for me, that job was significant.

Which of the films you've done will produce the most royalty checks?
Yogi Bear, for sure. Children's DVDs sell a lot more than serious films. That's why a lot of kids' movies get made. A lot of parents use them as babysitters. I'm assuming Yogi Bear is gonna sell a ton of DVDs when it comes out.

Favorite cartoon of all time?
I used to watch Bugs Bunny and the Road Runner a lot growing up. They still hold up.

Is Childrens Hospital*, your brother's show, the sickest thing on TV?*
I think TMZ is the sickest thing on TV, but it's a close second.

What do your parents think of it?
They like my sister more than either my brother or me, but seriously, they love it.

Is Colby-Sawyer College a hotbed of subversive comedic genius?
It is. We're sort of running neck-and-neck with Plymouth State in terms of fostering young talent.

Tell me a secret about Jon Stewart.
He's very short.

If he walked in the room, would I say, "Look at how short that guy is?"
No. That's Tom Cruise. Jon Stewart is more like Al Pacino small.

Are farts intrinsically funny?
Yes. Absolutely. Because they come from a dark place. Burps aren't as funny because they come from your mouth.

Finish this sentence: Kim Kardashian and Snooki get stuck on an elevator together....
And they decide to enter the Republican primary.

Is it cause for concern that a lot of people get their news from The Daily Show*?*
No. The average person who watches it is smart and has enough sense to distinguish satire from truth.

Your fantasy reality TV show?
Put 50 singles on the moon and see what happens. They have to deal with astronaut ice cream, peeing in bags and floating to see who wins the heart of the astronaut bachelor.

Worst job you ever had?
Washing dogs. I did it one summer, and I smelled like wet dog for three months. I got payed two dollars in cash per dog, and they'd be snarling at me, and snapping, and there would be crap in their butt. It was hardcore.

Will you make the cover of Vanity Fair*?*
[Laughs.] Nope. Not in this lifetime. My real dream is to throw out the first pitch at Fenway Park, anyway. I just want to be famous enough that members of the Red Sox know who I am. That's my goal. Vanity Fair can suck it. I wanna meet Youkilis. ✖✖✖

An implant the size of a grain of rice that instantly monitors tumors

FIVE CAMBRIDGE-BORN INNOVATIONS THAT ARE ABOUT TO CHANGE THE WORLD

BY NANCY GAINES

PORTRAITS BY JESSICA SCRANTON

WHAT'S THE WORD?
"Culturomics" gurus Erez Lieberman Aiden and Jean-Baptiste Michel

CAMBRIDGE:

One small city, so many great leaps forward. Nowadays, much of the thinking and tinkering takes place in Harvard and MIT labs on the Boston side of the river, but the epicenter remains in the first city of intellectual capital. From the north bank of the Charles springs earthshaking research that has upended the way we think and talk and move and eat and gaze at the stars.

You may have heard of MIT's investigation of Earth-like planets, or of the four Harvard students who invented "sOccket" so kids in developing countries can generate electricity just by kicking a ball. Consider the MIT inventors who created a wallet that gets harder to open the lower you drain your bank account. Or Harvard's new artificial hand, inspired by a cockroach. Today, the mashup of physical, engineering and life sciences—tagged "convergence"—is spurring breakthroughs on both campuses. Local wizards are exploring the mutability of DNA. The red-hot fields of optogenetics and epigenetics are poised to revamp our understanding of the stuff from which we're made.

Typically, you learn what these researchers are up to only after their works are published in journals or heralded by the media. But here are some coming attractions about how our neighbors are changing the world.

DEEP IMPLANT

Biopsies are the gold standard of cancer detection and treatment. However they're invasive and can't be done every few minutes to check if a treatment is working. Enter Michael Cima and his team at the David H. Koch Institute for Integrative Cancer Research at MIT, where university president Susan Hockfield says research potentially leading to "the greatest impact on civilization" is under way.

With a team including biomedical engineer Sangeeta Bhatia and chemical engineer Paula Hammond, Cima developed an implant smaller than a grain of rice that discharges a stream of information about the impact of therapy at the site of a tumor. "Everybody's cancer is different, in pretty dramatic ways," says Cima, 51, a professor of materials science and engineering, and a drug-delivery expert. "The choice of therapy is difficult." His new device, based on nanotechnology, can determine with "exquisite measurement" what option works best. Given funding, the next tests will be on pets. ("Dogs get cancer, too," Cima says.) The team hopes to have the tool in the hands of physicians soon.

MATERIAL GOOD

New materials beget new technologies, which in turn prompt wonderful things like electric cars, and employment. But new materials don't appear overnight, and it takes an average of 18 years before a material reaches the market. The hit-or-miss testing of a substance's nuanced properties also impedes manufacturing at a time when the American cri de coeur is jobs, jobs and more jobs.

"We should do better," says MIT's Gerbrand Ceder. A professor of materials science and engineering, Ceder, 45, is the father of blazing fast lithium batteries. He now heads up the Materials Genome Project, a group whose modest aim is to reinvent U.S. manufacturing.

Ceder's project will create a database identifying precise properties of hundreds of thousands of compounds (metals, ceramics, plastics, etc.), an index that could significantly reduce product development times and increase the success rate of data mining, leading to better products.

"THE GROUP'S MODEST AIM IS TO REINVENT U.S. MANUFACTURING."

Under the old method, researchers experimented with boatloads of components to distinguish their beneficial properties (say, high energy) from their bad properties (high volatility). With Ceder's calculations, all the properties of any old or new material will already be evident. Trial and error now requires months to test one material; the new program will screen as many as 100 in a day.

Their database "should be done within a year," says Ceder, who believes his project will upstage the vaunted Human Genome Project "because it's even closer to application."

FORECAST SAYS...

Predicting "the next Tim Russerts" and preventing stealth heart attacks is the goal of a team of physicians and scientists under the aegis of Harvard's School of Engineering and Applied Sciences. The Multiscale Hemodynamics Project is creating a tool to examine blood flow with an eye toward spotting cardiac blockage, which can cause sudden heart failure.

"Some people, like Tim Russert, experience a heart attack just out of nowhere," says Charles Feldman, 75, a cardiovascular expert at Brigham and Women's Hospital who teaches at Harvard and is one of the lead investigators. "They have no symptoms, or mild ones. The trick is to find these people and fix them."

VEIN EVENT
Imaging blood flow in the Hemodynamics Project

A computerized imaging device like a futuristic CAT scanner, Feldman's noninvasive early warning system could look at your cardiac arteries in 3-D and predict real-life consequences, based on a "if this, then that" data bank. Currently, the only way to see "shear stress" is to insert a wire and ultrasound camera into the heart—a technique that Feldman also developed.

Michelle Borkin, 26, is a 3-D specialist in this new "convergence" field of medicine. "To be more accurate about where plaque is in patients, you can't look at a live person," she says. "In astronomy, you can't go into outer space with a test tube. Both disciplines rely on simulation." The success of the project, which could more easily and widely pinpoint people at risk, would be "a dream come true," Borkin says.

Feldman thinks this dream will arrive in hospitals within five years.

MIND-BENDING

Imagine you could slip inside someone else's head to learn how they determine right or wrong, or what they like or dislike. Then imagine you could derail that train of thought and set it on a different track. Imagine no more.

MIT scientists in Rebecca Saxe's "Saxelab"—officially the Social Cognitivie Neuroscience Laboratory—already had techniques to identify the source of judgments and intentions in the brain. Now they have the power, via magnetic interference, to alter those ideas. Saxe's earlier studies show a particular section of the brain is highly active when a person thinks about someone's intentions, thoughts and beliefs. By disrupting activity there—with a magnetic zap applied through a device attached to the scalp—you can alter the process of judgment. Rather then intuition or personal bias, the judger must now rely more on facts and outcomes.

Dubbed the neuroscience of empathy, the specter of mind control may give pause. But for Saxe, 31, it's a benign attitude adjustment, a tool that could potentially be used to intuit motivation, lessen negative behaviors and perhaps, ultimately, defuse global conflict.

Saxe's lab is now working to see whether insights into how the brain reacts to cues from others can help unlock mysteries about autism. By studying the atypical, such as the reactions of blind children, she hopes to learn how facial expression affects judgments. By learning about the brain region that allows juries to reach verdicts—and "what oversimplifications and flaws there are in the process"—Saxe believes her work could eventually help the justice system assess guilt more accurately.

MIND IS THE MATTER
Neuroscientist Rebecca Saxe

"You can change attitudes, if you figure out a strategy to understand how empathy breaks down," Saxe says. "It's a way to answer why is it so hard to know what someone wants or believes, and why is it so hard to change that."

POPULAR SEARCHES

In December, two Harvard polymaths designed a new science, called "culturomics." Over four years, Erez Lieberman Aiden, 30, and Jean-Baptiste Michel, 28, of the multidisciplinary Laboratory-at-Large in the engineering school, tracked the occurrence of 500 billion words in more than 5 million digitized books, published from 1500 to 2008. The two had first teamed up in 2004 on a language study, but "the data collection was miserable," Lieberman Aiden says. "So we pitched Google."

Their NGram (meaning word or short phrase) project is a linguistic barometer of civilization and how it's evolving. It's "the tip of the cultural iceberg," he says.

The study illuminates censorship and trends. For example, actors tend to become famous at 30, writers at 40, politicians in their 50s. Suppression, too, can be tracked, as with artist Marc Chagall, whose name was in rapid ascent until the Nazi era, during which it appeared only once in German books.

Other trends this dynamic duo noticed: "Women" are exceeding "men"; sushi is conclusively on the U.S. menu. And "God," they report, "is not dead but needs a new publicist."

The research is "a great cache of bones from which to reconstruct the skeleton of a new science," Lieberman Aiden says. Adds Michel, "And how much fun is it to work on that!" ×××

HIDDEN CAMBRIDGE

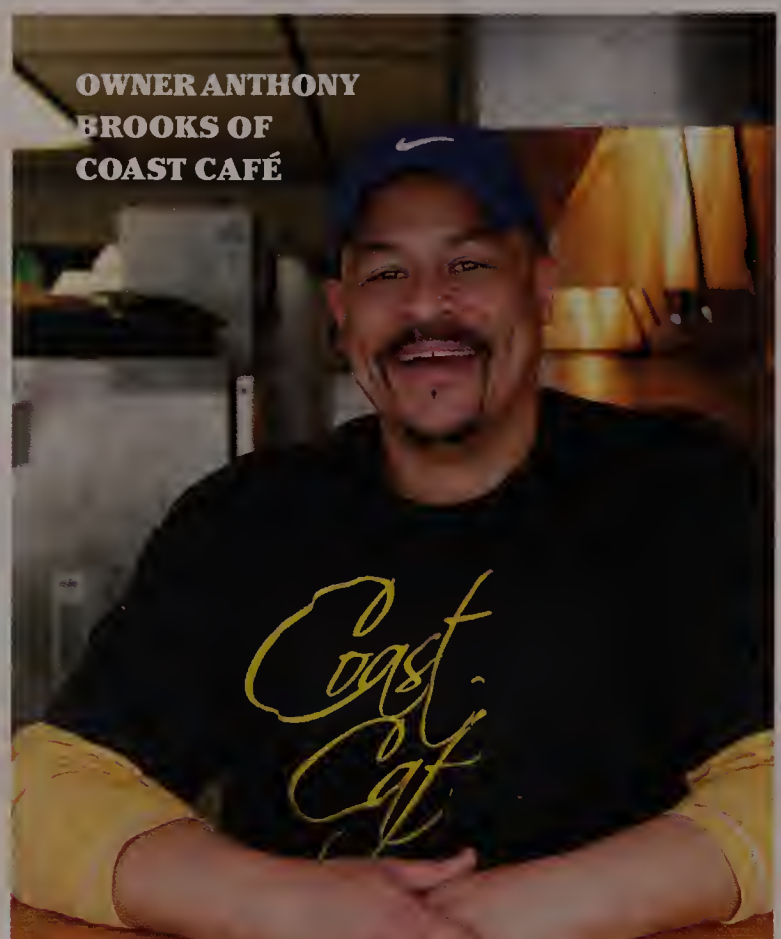
EXPLORING THE UNSUNG NEIGHBORHOODS OF THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC

BY ERIN BYERS MURRAY AND KIM GIRARD

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HARRIET GROPPE, KATIE NOBLE AND DAN WATKINS

VERNA'S IN NORTH CAMBRIDGE

Harvard, Central, Inman, Kendall, Porter... Cambridge's popular hubs are as well-trodden as the ancient cow paths that once formed the city's main streets. Fed by dorm houses, by the human funnel of the Red Line or, in Inman's case, by a rollicking dining scene that sprang up in the shadow of East Coast Grill, they're as overexposed as the human statues outside Au Bon Pain on Mass. Ave. To glimpse Cambridge outside the postcard frame, you need to venture into its less-traveled neighborhoods.



EAST CAMBRIDGE

ATASCA

A five-block area of narrow streets dotted with colorful row houses and anchored by the Charles Bulfinch–designed Middlesex County Court House, this area was once an ethnic melting pot of Polish, Irish, Italian and Portuguese. Leaving aside the effects of gentrification and the CambridgeSide Galleria, neighborhood gems include NEW DEAL FISH MARKET—arguably the city's prime spot for shellfish and sashimi-grade selections. Owner and third-generation fishmonger Carl Fantasia offers 30 to 80 fish varieties daily, as well as advice on how to devein shrimp or shuck an oyster. Depending on the catch, you might find fresh yellowfin tuna, organic Chinook salmon or New England fluke, and you can round out your order with a can of Sicilian salted anchovies. Down the road, the catch comes cooked at COURTHOUSE SEAFOOD RESTAURANT, serving high-grade fish and chips, chowder and fried clams. Grilled varieties are on the menu at DESFINA, a quaint brick hangout on the corner behind the courthouse, which also dishes up traditional Greek fare like tzatziki, dolmades and lamb kebab. Owner Steve Mallakis has run the place for 14 years. Portuguese specialties draw diners to ATASCA, a destination for delicacies like shellfish stew and charcoal-grilled salt cod washed down with a bottle of vinho verde. More casual comfort food is available at THE SNACK BAR; try the Portuguese man-of-war, a sub roll stacked with roast pork, ham, American cheese and fried egg, or the dobrada, a stew of white beans and tripe, with cod cakes costing 60 cents each. Pair them with a Sumol, a Portuguese fruit soda, and end with a flan-like Portuguese custard.

COAST CAFÉ

CAMBRIDGEPORT

This knot of streets inside a bend of the Charles River is packed tight with triple-deckers, hidden yards and the odd, old Victorian. For those who only know River Street, the hood's outer edge and main artery to Central Square, it's worth looking inward for budget dining and bargain discoveries. Of note is ALIVE & KICKING LOBSTERS, an unexpected fish market buried along residential Putnam Avenue. Grab a lobster-stuffed sandwich (between two slices of toasted white) with chips for a picnic on the water. For a more soul-inflected taste, River Street's COAST CAFÉ serves up Cambridge's most underrated fried chicken, while RIVER GODS takes honors for its extensive vegetarian menu as well as habit-forming French fries. Nearby, GREAT EASTERN TRADING COMPANY offers an eclectic used-clothing collection, good for sourcing a pair of worn-in cowboy boots or next fall's Halloween getup. And over near rock club T.T. the Bears, the dark and cozy enclave BROOKLINE LUNCH serves up huge omelets for cheap.

HURON VILLAGE

Set just west of Harvard Square, Huron Village (centered, of course, on Huron Avenue) is one of those idyllic, European-tinged neighborhoods where one imagines residents strolling arm-in-arm, stopping in at the bakery, then the market, before throwing elegant fetes in their immaculate parlors. Visitors here can spend a civilized afternoon window-shopping, then buy dinner straight off the boat from THE FISHMONGER, where slabs of salmon and fresh-caught East Coast bass glisten in glass cases. The bluefish pâté is especially outstanding. Nearby, the famed FORMAGGIO KITCHEN stocks pantry items, international cheeses and all the local vegetables you need to round out the meal. Up the street, Finnish design outpost MARIMEKKO carries bold-patterned table and bed linens, while the intentionally cluttered home store DIDRIKS, on Concord Avenue, fills every decorative need from wall hangings to vases. Cap off the day with a meal at the homey T.W. FOOD, where chef Tim Wiechmann puts hyper-local ingredients into his fancy, fine-tuned dishes.

THE GARMENT DISTRICT

CAMBRIDGE BICYCLE

AREA IV

It's hard to believe there's no better name for this section of Cambridge, sitting north of Mass. Ave. and soon to be swarming with culinary options. (Is NoMa taken?) Bounded by a row of gritty warehouses, Area IV's quaint, tree-lined streets and family parks are drawing buzz as rumors that a handful of new restaurants—including Area IV, the new pizzeria/coffeeshop from Michael Krupp and Michael Leviton—are about to join BONDIR, the snug, 28-seater opened by chef Jason Bond last fall. With its roaring fireplace, church pews for banquettes and pieces of grandma's mismatched china, Bondir and its ever-changing menu are worth the walk down Broadway. Over on Hampshire, beer geek heaven LORD HOBO pours scores of specialty drafts alongside upscale tavern fare. You might consider a day-long bike rental (complete with a basket attachment) from CAMBRIDGE BICYCLE, before pedaling over to 25-year-old shop THE GARMENT DISTRICT, where vintage clothing hides out when costume season comes to an end.

NORTH CAMBRIDGE

It's not fabulous Davis Square, but there's still plenty to do along the Somerville border. Start by noshing on chocolate-frosted or butter-crunch treats at VERNA'S, an old-school bakery that specializes in the Honey Tip, a honey-dipped donut named for late Congressman Tip O'Neill, who used to frequent the store. (Owner Richard Brunet's grandmother brought him Verna's donuts when he was a kid, so Brunet bought the shop from the long-time owner four years ago.) Fueled by Verna's coffee, a well-dressed man should stop by DRINKWATER'S. Owner Gary Drinkwater, formerly of Louis Boston and Stonestreet, sells tailored clothes from Southwick and Samuelsohn, trousers from Hertling, Jack Victor and Hiltl, dress shirts from Hilditch & Key and Ingram, and Paraboot footwear. Engineered Garment sportswear by designer Daiki Suzuki has been a store staple since Drinkwater's opened six and a half years ago. Farther up the road, devoted tipplers make the pilgrimage to MODERN HOMEBREW EMPORIUM. In addition to beer and winemaking supplies, the super-friendly staff offers professional beer crafting advice. For lunch or dinner, there's solid Lebanese fare at family-owned CAFE BARADA, serving standards like falafel and shish kebab alongside daily specials like tender lamb with peas, carrots and tomatoes simmered in tomato sauce. At GREEK CORNER RESTAURANT, a serious lunch can take the form of a "special gyro" or a dish of excellent moussaka. House-made soups and prepared foods are a specialty at PEMBERTON FARMS. You can pick up some fresh Iggy's bread and Lakota Bakery cookies there, too. For dinner, try FRANK'S STEAK HOUSE, Boston's oldest, for a classic New York sizzler sirloin washed down with a nice Chianti.

THE MAD CLOSET

GREG'S RESTAURANT

STRAWBERRY HILL

Strawberry Hill is the smallest of Cambridge's neighborhoods and is home to a mere 2,500 residents (most of whom never leave, real estate agents lament). It's no wonder, considering the neighborhood is bridged by historic Mount Auburn Cemetery to the south and placid Fresh Pond reservation to the north. A small retail strip stretches along the Belmont and Watertown borders. For a satisfying massage or acupuncture, locals swear by the therapists at ORIENTAL MEDICINE. This healing center is staffed by the unusual duo of a registered nurse/in vitro fertilization specialist and by a psychic medium. Co-owner acupuncturists Laura Corrigan and Santosh Karmacharya specialize in herbalism and Nepalese body work, respectively. In addition to tai chi and ba gua classes, the center will soon add Latin dance. Shoppers searching for a lacy Victorian frock, a gold-sequined Oscar de la Renta dress or an antique lingerie chest should check out LADY LUXE, run by Carolina Shea and her sister Danielle McLoud, who are partial to collecting '50s and '60s garb. Around the corner at the THE MAD CLOSET, you'll find new and resale clothing from the '50s to the '80s and labels from Old Navy to Chanel, Gap to Prada. If the line at Sofra is intolerably long, take a quick walk up across the Watertown side to FORDEE'S for a scrumptious plate of falafel. Or head past the cemetery to GREG'S, an old-school Italian-American restaurant and bar where you can tuck into chicken Marsala or an eggplant parm served by a waitress who might just call you honey.

GENDER STUDIES

SINCE 1844, HARVARD'S Hasty Pudding has been entertaining audiences with student-authored satire and colorful cross-dressing. Running through March 6, this year's production has a spicy kick, as the dolled-up drag queens perform an epic musical, Kashmir if You Can. A kingdom is plunged into chaos when a maharaja dies, leaving his ditzy daughter, the heiress to the throne, at the mercy of her evil stepmother. Throw in a suspicious slumdog millionaire, an absent-minded detective and a steamy love triangle, and the Pudding's shtick has more layers than a trifle. AMANDA WARREN

Kashmir if You Can runs through March 6 at the Hasty Pudding Theatre, $28–$38, 12 Holyoke St., Cambridge (617-495-5205) hastypudding.org.

Giving Glam

Hollywood Hits Home The closest most of us get to Hollywood glitz is the odd Affleck sighting on the Common. As the Bay State's only soiree sanctioned by the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, the Oscar Night Boston Gala adds a little tinsel to Beantown. Joan Rivers won't be dropping bon mots on the red carpet, but the city's glammest will flock to the Mandarin Oriental on Feb. 27. Cheer for local talent and Boston-filmed flicks up for the golden boys this year, with proceeds benefiting the Ellie Fund's fight against breast cancer. Hilary White

Super Nanny

Let's Get It Poppin' Supercalifragili—oh, forget it. Some things are best left to the professionals. Brimming with fanciful humor and Victorian social mores, the familiar Mary Poppins tale is now updated with colorful sets and an expanded score. Disney's stage adaptation of the classic family flick was a smash on Broadway and in London's West End. Everyone's favorite nanny flies her umbrella into the Boston Opera House Feb. 17–March 20. Amanda Warren

Biutiful ★ ½ The Bataan Death March of art-directed sorrow, director Alejandro González Iñárritu's fourth feature wallows in hopelessness, rubbing your nose in filth, sadness and despair so suffocating it becomes comical. Javier Bardem stars as Uxbal, a two-bit hustler just barely scraping by on the ugly side of Barcelona and attempting to rescue his kids from their abusive, bipolar mother. She's a part-time hooker who's also sleeping with Uxbal's sleazy, obese brother when she's not busy slapping around the children. Uxbal also happens to be dying of prostate cancer… and can talk to dead people. But that doesn't figure into the story as much as you might expect. Or really, at all. For all his formal brio, Iñárritu is at a complete artistic dead end, fixated on the inherent nobility of suffering without a larger point to make. Biutiful lumbers toward a preordained, pitiless conclusion without a single organizing idea or overarching theme besides the uninspired notion that life can really suck sometimes, and eventually you die. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Blue Valentine ★★★★ The ghost of John Cassavetes looms large over writer/director Derek Cianfrance's second feature. Blue Valentine is a vicious little number, charting the courtship and dissolution of a marriage, often in alternating scenes. Whiplashing from the dizzying heights of adolescent infatuation back to middle-age sadness, the movie somehow captures both the euphoria of attraction and the hellish claustrophobia of a failed relationship. It's exasperating, infuriating and something very special. Ryan Gosling stars as Dean, a swaggering bad-boy who likes to drink beer for breakfast but really has a heart of gold. The only person in the world who sees this is Michelle Williams' Cindy, a local girl who's been around the block a few times. The connection between Dean and Cindy is at first electric, then deadening. Though sometimes too schematic in its construction, the movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam until there's nothing left but hurt. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The Company Men ★★ Acclaimed TV director John Wells' feature debut deals with the plight of downsized business execs, but with around 10 percent of the country out of work, it's tough to feel torn up about Ben Affleck having to sell his Porsche. Despite the contributions of brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins, The Company Men has a distinctly small-screen sensibility, often feeling like an entire season of one of Wells' polished dramas (ER, The West Wing) whittled down to feature length. It also feels inauthentic, a combination of talking points and statistics missing the grace notes of real-life experience. Adding to the ersatz pallor is Hollywood's recent, unfortunate affinity for terrible Boston accents. Like an English drawing-room drama spoken in Cockney slang, The Company Men's moneyed, white-collar MBA's all drop their R's and bellow profanity like extras from The Fighter. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Dilemma ★★ What's a nice guy like Ron Howard doing directing a movie like this? Vince Vaughn's latest misjudged comedy resembles his shockingly bitter 2006 rom-com The Break-Up, as both the darkness of the performer and the material clang against banal sitcom trappings. Vaughn stars as a recovering gambling addict who discovers that his best friend/business partner (Kevin James, the TV actor with no place on the big screen) is being cuckolded by his cheerfully vindictive wife (Winona Ryder). There's plenty of fodder for dark farce here,

THE ENVELOPE…PLEEZE!

How a little, gold man can cause a whole lot of hoopla.

"WHAT'S WITH ALL these awards in Hollywood? They're always giving out awards. Best Fascist Dictator: Adolf Hitler."—Woody Allen, Annie Hall.

It's that time of the year again, or rather, it has been for several months now. Oscar season unofficially kicks off when the first contenders are unveiled at the Toronto International Film Festival each September, and the hype machine doesn't let up for at least six months. When the winners of the 83rd annual Academy Awards are announced at the Kodak Theatre on Feb. 27, I'll be breathing a giant sigh of relief that all has finally been said and done. Maybe then we might be able to get back to our lives and focus on something else… anything else?

We've already sat through carbon-copied acceptance tomes at the Golden Globes, the Screen Actors Guild Awards and the Critics' Choice Awards. There's been more boozing and schmoozing than Charlie Sheen's typical Tuesday.

Although results from the British Academy of Film and Television Arts ceremony won't be announced 'til after this goes to press, I think we can safely assume that The King's Speech cleaned up. And don't forget, the Film Independent Spirit Awards are still waiting in the wings.

As for the Critics' societies—Boston's chapter is just one on the list, stretching from Hollywood to the middle of nowhere. There's also the National Society of Film Critics, the Black Film Critics Circle and both the Alliance of Women Film Journalists and the Women Film Critics Circle.

Poring over all this data from so many disparate organizations, the one thing I've been able to glean is that a lot of people really enjoyed The Social Network.

Yet Oscar remains the main event, staking out primetime turf weeks after all the precursor ceremonies, with even financially-strapped newspapers hiring full-time "Oscar prognosticators" to keep track of the day-in, day-out vagaries of the horse race. Make no mistake: This is a big business, as reliant upon dirty politics as a local election. Taking into account "For Your Consideration" trade magazine advertisements, private screenings and lavish meet-and-greet parties, it's not uncommon for movie studios to blow more money wooing Academy voters than was spent on making the films themselves.

Does anybody still think that Oscar-favorite Dances With Wolves was a better movie than Goodfellas?

In sillier times I cared about such things. Nowadays, I just feel sorry for the nominees. How exhausting it must be to do quality work in a picture that has been recognized by your peers, only to have to run an endless, contractually-obligated, red-carpet gauntlet, answering dopey questions for Access Hollywood while delivering the same "gracious" speeches ad infinitum for the duration of a college semester? My heart goes out to director David Fincher, who's currently in Sweden trying to shoot The Girl With the Dragon Tattoo, yet finds himself stuck flying back to Los Angeles to join the glad-handing circuit every time some podunk organization clicks "like" on The Social Network.

Meanwhile, at its awards ceremony last month, our own Boston Society of Film Critics disappointingly neglected to address the routine practice of both the AMC Boston Common and Regal Fenway cinemas of digitally projecting 2-D movies through a 3-D lens, thereby significantly muting the colors, while also dimming and distorting the image. I can't recall the last time I saw a film at either location presented properly, and I attended advance screenings of True Grit at both theaters, with the same dire result each time.

It was only after the commercial release that I was able to make the haul to the suburbs and at last see Roger Deakins' brilliant photography as it was meant to be exhibited. Amusingly enough, in the interim, the BSFC voted Deakins the year's best cinematographer, based solely upon those early, shoddy screenings. It makes you wonder what other accolades this marvelous film might've received, had only somebody bothered to place the correct lens on the projector.

We get in for free. You're paying $11.50 for this crap. More pressing matters abound than instantly forgettable lists of accolades.

Great movies stand the test of time. Award recognition fades in the rearview mirror. Driving Miss Daisy won best picture the same year Do the Right Thing wasn't even nominated, but decades have a funny way of separating the wheat from the chaff. Does anybody still think that Oscar-favorite Dances With Wolves was a better movie than GoodFellas? Meanwhile, I bet you can't even tell me who won best supporting actor last year. (I had to look it up.) ✖✖✖ as Vaughn and Ryder rip into each other with an aggression that seems to terrify director Opie, still incapable of helming any confrontation that doesn't end in a group hug. Howard backs away time and again from the material's ugly undercurrents, resorting to lame slapstick, goofy music cues and James' fat-guy dance moves. The tonal incoherence stretches to include a deeply moving, deadly serious performance from Jennifer Connelly that seems beamed in from another picture. This one is all over the map. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Fighter ★★★ A low-budget labor of love for producer/star Mark Wahlberg, The Fighter follows The Town and Conviction in last year's Massachusetts Lampoon Show, in which glamorous movie stars drop their R's and wear tacky clothes to convey "authenticity." Blue-collar Bostonian has replaced redneck as Hollywood's white-trash signifier of choice. Based on the true story of Lowell boxing legend "Irish" Micky Ward, the film stars Wahlberg as the long-suffering anchor of a spectacularly dysfunctional family. As his troubled brother, Christian Bale bellows into the camera—bug-eyed with rotten teeth—and gives the kind of terrible performance that wins Academy Awards. But The Fighter turns out to be a pretty good movie, especially when Bale is off-screen. The film never strays too far from traditional sports-movie formula, but director David O. Russell imbues the clichés with manic energy, shooting from unexpected angles and eliciting subtle, heartfelt performances from Wahlberg and Amy Adams, who hold the center of this circus with quiet dignity. It gets better as it goes along. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Green Hornet ★★ ½ Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind director Michel Gondry has such a gentle sense of whimsy that the idea of him directing one of Seth Rogen's potty-mouthed, blowhard vehicles doesn't quite compute. Add the studio mandates of a big-budget superhero franchise and you get a scattered and schizophrenic experience. Gondry's fondness for antiquated technologies and visual curlicues don't mesh with writer/star Rogen's swaggering frat-boy bravado. Disparate sensibilities clash all over the place in this notoriously troubled production about a slovenly spoiled heir who takes up costumed crime-fighting on a lark, thanks mostly to his hypercompetent assistant, Kato (Jay Chou). The idea of a jackass masked crusader is a welcome one in this era of solemn superhero epics, but this rather amusing movie feels assembled at odd angles, with a lot of clever comic conceits that never quite work together. Yet, The Green Hornet is also oddly endearing at the end. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Harry Potter and the Deathly Hallows: Part I ★★ Half a movie at full-ticket price, the seventh film of this beloved series follows in the footsteps of last summer's woefully underwhelming Half-Blood Prince, serving as a glum exposition dump with no payoff. Adored by the rabid fans of J.K. Rowling's books and confounding to us Muggles, the Potter films are increasingly alienating to anyone not up-to-date on Quidditch strategy. Presupposing a familiarity with the source material, the latest installment begins midspeech and ends with a cliffhanger. Constant references are made to the events of previous pictures, which some of us haven't seen in years and frankly can't remember all that well. A shame, as director David Yates' first crack at the franchise (2007's Order of the Phoenix) was the only Potter film to function as a stand-alone movie. No such luck this time, and some lovely visuals can't compensate for a brutal second half in which all the kids mope around the woods like it's wizard Twilight. (In the suburbs.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

No Strings Attached ★★ Natalie Portman and charisma vacuum Ashton Kutcher star in this raunchy romantic comedy that wonders if two friends can sleep together without falling in

Skin-Deep

Made in Italy Why are humans so obsessed with physical beauty? That's the question at the center of Luchino Visconti's Death in Venice, the story of Aschenbach, a dying composer who escapes to Venice and becomes obsessed with a beautiful young man. Spurring viewers to consider the link between beauty and desire, the Feb. 21 screening at the Coolidge Corner Theatre will be preceded by a discussion with Nancy Etcoff, researcher and author of Survival of the Prettiest: The Science of Beauty. Caroline Jones love. An interesting question, but not one that applies to Elizabeth Meriwether's screenplay, as these two crazy kids are obviously in love from the very first frames, and there's absolutely nothing keeping them apart except the annoying demands of the movie's premise. A shame, as director Ivan Reitman has assembled a killer supporting cast to steal every scene that isn't nailed down. Greenberg's Greta Gerwig and local Office gal Mindy Kaling deserve a movie of their own as Portman's sassy roommates. Kevin Kline is hysterical as Kutcher's lothario father, a vain TV star with a fondness for younger women and Lil' Wayne. Even the tiniest parts are fleshed out by pros like Olivia Thirlby, Abby Elliott and Ludacris. Alas, these stars swirl around the black hole that is Kutcher and Portman, tediously stalling for time before the movie finally arrives at its foregone conclusion. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Rabbit Hole ★★★★ Grief is so much messier and confusing than most movies allow. The miracle of this small, revealing and surprisingly funny gem from director John Cameron Mitchell is that the story begins long after most pictures would've rolled the credits. It's been nine months since a suburban couple (strikingly well-played by Nicole Kidman and Aaron Eckhart) lost their four-year-old son in a car accident. Based on an off-Broadway play by David Lindsay-Abaire, Rabbit Hole is primarily concerned with questions about moving on, how soon is too soon and can things ever go back to any semblance of normal? As evidenced in his Hedwig and the Angry Inch and triumphant Shortbus, Mitchell is a filmmaker who genuinely likes people, a much scarcer trait than you might imagine. Deeply compassionate and attuned to the odd, amusing moments that sometimes erupt during emotional anguish, Rabbit Hole feels awkward and real, accepting that there are no easy answers. (In the suburbs.)

The Rite ★ "What did you expect," Anthony Hopkins' grumbling, workaday exorcist asks: "Spinning heads? Pea soup?" No. That would have been entertaining. Instead, director Mikael Håfström's contribution to the curiously resilient demonic-possession genre gives us plodding, docudrama earnestness. Purporting to be "inspired by true events," The Rite wants to have its cake and eat it too, pretending to take questions of faith seriously—until it's time for the money shots and CGI effects to kick in. Dishwater-dull Colin O'Donoghue stars as a skeptical seminary student aiming to swindle the Catholic Church out of a free college education, but an inadvertently hilarious combination of accidents send him to Rome, studying under Hopkins' scenery-chewing cleric. This was done better in 1973, and if you've seen one young girl writhing around in restraints, hissing obscenities in foreign tongues, you've seen them all. Meanwhile, the PG-13 rating ensures that her invective is limited to the likes of: "Your mother darns socks in heck." No crucifixes were harmed in the making of this picture. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Sanctum ★ ½ Even though we're all pretty much sick of the gimmick already, James Cameron still believes in 3D. As producer of this thoroughly unremarkable and sometimes laughably acted adventure flick, Cameron has given his blessing and loaned his Avatar cameras to an Australian production that otherwise feels like one of those cheap movies you'd find on the SyFy channel at some unfortunate hour of the morning. Dewy, over-emotive Rhys Wakefield stars as the rebellious son of Richard Roxburgh's cranky Cousteau-ish explorer. When a cave dive goes awry, the two are forced into family bonding in claustrophobic, flooding crawl spaces. Directed by Alister Grierson, Sanctum boasts all its producer's weaknesses and none of his strengths. Characters spew goofy gobs of exposition and constantly inform the audience that they're seeing something spectacular. (In actuality, it doesn't look so hot.) The banality of the father-son drama is more suffocating than the cramped quarters, and Ioan Gruffudd's performance as a Richard Branson wannabe boasts some of the most amateurish line-readings this side of community theater. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her Pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured, absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

WALLS THAT TALK

The Low Anthem summons haunting folk-rock sounds from extreme environs.

The Low Anthem plays Old South Church on March 4.

Ryan Mastro

WITH ITS ORNATE stained-glass windows and vaulted ceilings, Old South Church stands as a stately Back Bay sanctuary, not a hip concert venue. But it's just the kind of place to attract indie-folk darlings the Low Anthem, playing there on March 4.

"We love the sound of our music—particularly the pump organ and the vocal harmonies—in a church," cofounding bassist/drummer Jeff Prystowsky says. "And also the feeling of guilt that people bring when they walk into church. That kind of energy can oftentimes have a positive effect on the show."

In turn, the Low Anthem recorded its new CD Smart Flesh in a cavernous, vacant Rhode Island factory last winter. "We said, 'Let's try to find a space that could be like a church,'" he says. "An alternative space that has its own unique surroundings and its own unique reverb. And we found that in the pasta-sauce factory."

The building had been used to manufacture former Providence Mayor Buddy Cianci's brand of marinara. Since the fabled mayor served prison time for corruption, is this where their interest in guilt originates? Prystowsky laughs, saying they didn't know about Cianci's history with the factory when they decided to work there, despite the tomato-shaped welcome mat.

"The space colored the record to such an extent that we really think of it as the primary instrument on the recording," Prystowsky says of the factory's acoustic qualities. That's no small feat for a group of multi-instrumentalists whose arsenal includes antique drums and organs, horns, hammered dulcimers, musical saws, jaw harps and crotales, a set of tuned cymbals played with a bow.

It took a month for the self-producing band to strategically place microphones and amplifiers to capture the best sounds. The complex's industrial heaters, a bicycle's ride apart, determined the group's living and working areas. But they were too noisy for recording, and space heaters proved insufficient for a building that couldn't hold heat.

"We were recording all night in frigid conditions with gloves, scarves and overcoats," Prystowsky recalls of the "chops-busting cold" that slowed the pace of their playing. "We'd huddle up and say, 'Here's what we're going to do. Let's do it beautifully.' And we'd focus in and get as close to each other as we could." The band's core dynamics and working conditions are manifest in the album's intimate sound.

Prystowsky and singer/guitarist Ben Knox Miller met as fellow "baseball nuts" and college radio DJs at Brown University, where they began to jam together with Dan Lefkowitz. Prystowsky grew up in New York City jazz clubs, while Miller was into Bob Dylan and Leonard Cohen. After discovering Tom Waits, they began switching instruments to vary arrangements.

Lefkowitz left the band and moved to Arkansas (though he returns as an opening act at Old South Church), and classically trained Bostonian Jocie Adams came aboard, completing the trio that recorded 2009's critically lauded Oh My God, Charlie Darwin in a cabin on Block Island. The addition of Berklee-trained Mat Davidson on tour and now on Smart Flesh marked the group's development into a diverse quartet.

In tune with its origins, the new disc favors a more atmospheric vibe, from the plaintive "Ghost Woman Blues" to the Copland-esque tone poem "Wire," capped by Adams' somber clarinet. But Prystowsky says the band realized the record might benefit from sonic contrast and added three tracks from a summertime session in a garage that had more in common with the Block Island space.

"Complete opposite conditions," he says of the Gator Pit, which they christened the garage that once housed reptiles. "It was muggy and moldy." Not that a listener would be able to discern the contrasting environment in the Leonard Cohen–like lilt of "Burn" and the stomping "Hey, All You Hippies!"

There's an adaptability to the Low Anthem, who shift to rock-club mode to open for Iron and Wine at the House of Blues on April 19. "We never play the same set list," Prystowsky says. "And we're always reacting to whatever the room is bringing us." ✖✖✖

Heartbreak Ho Tells

Frankly Speaking Hometown troupe Ad Frank and the Fast Easy Women have already made a name for themselves in the Boston music scene with their heartsore tunes. The recipe for these suffering songbirds and their New Wave pop power: equal parts Velvet Underground and Leonard Cohen topped off with '70s-era synthesizers à la David Bowie. Their last record, 2009's Your Secrets Are Mine Now, is bold and unapologetically kitschy, securing the band a spot among New England's glam-rock royalty. Hear their glittery tunes at the Middle East Upstairs on Feb. 18.

Museums & Galleries

Child's Play

Pop Goes the Easel Hold the glitter glue and Crayola; nostalgia comes to the canvas in Todd McKie's exhibition of collage paintings and sculptures at Victoria Munroe Fine Art Gallery. With bold colors and playful strokes, McKie's works seem to emerge from a twisted primary school art class. In Sunny With a Chance of Seafood, he arranges vibrant boxes of modernist body parts to form distorted portraits—in terms of perspective, they're head-scratchers. McKie's energy, puns and artful parodies in woodwork and paint are on view through Feb. 26.

BON TEMPS

Just Bead It

Fat Tuesday on a Saturday night in January? Why not? Especially if it's Big Night, the annual blowout for Big Brothers/Big Sisters that's like a frat party for billionaires, held at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center.

Instead of kegs, there's a bar in every direction. Instead of pizza, there's a four-course feast prepared by best-selling cookbook authors Michael Schlow, Chris Schlesinger, Angela and Seth Raynor and Joanne Chang. And instead of some stoner's crappy band, there's music by the white-hot Michael Franti & Spearhead, followed by the legendary Neville Brothers.

First-class all around, thanks to the precedent set by the party's founder, hedge fund dodecadillionaire Jim Pallota, and the continued largesse of beneficent bigshots like cochairs Joe Ayoub and Tim Dibble and honoree Marty Mannion.

The award for Mardi Gras MVP goes to one of two hot blonde moms, Courtney Forrester or Ashley Bernon—depending on whose booze-goggles you were looking through while they were dancing dressed as New Orleans Saints cheerleaders. Truthfully, I don't remember. But I know it was an amazing party.

Kome on Down

Wait a second. A networking event in Boston with as many black, Asian, Latino, gay and trans-whatevered people as pasty-faced, polyester-wearing white people? And at a bar where you can get a decent drink?

Such a thing exists, every other month, with the intentionally misspelled (we hope) Get Konnected, held at Art Bar.

The star of the evening was competitive squash player turned culinary cottage industry Ming Tsai, signing copies of his new cookbook for the likes of Harvard factotums Bob Mitchell and Loc Truong and former Mayor of Cambridge Ken Reeves.

The crowd was interesting, as was the food, and among the amusing comments overheard was, "I like connecting with people on every level: professional, personal and physical."

Playing With Fire

What's hot about firemen? To begin with, "They've got big hoses," as Lenny Clarke pointed out at the Boston Firehouse Chili Cookoff to benefit The Greater Boston Food Bank, held at the Four Seasons.

Clarke, along with the hotel's executive chef, Brooke Vosika, officiated the competition, and guests got to vote on 13 entries, which ranged from spicy turkey to smoked brisket. Even better, they were served up by guys in uniform, at least 12 of whom were hot enough to make one of those cheesy calendars (I counted).

Julie-Hume Gordon, Kate Shamon, cookoff winner Dennis Carr of Ladder 23 (Grove Hall), Samantha Strauss and Julia Owens at the Boston Firehouse Chili Cookoff

Shayna Seymour at Dress for Success

I ate my weight in chili, while getting rip-roaring rambunctious with the likes of TV Diner babe Jenny Johnson, the hardest-working man in showbiz, Billy Costa, yummy mummy Julie-Hume Gordon, bombshells Samantha Strauss and Julia Owens, stalwart partygoers Lynn and Gary Smith, and others too delightful to mention.

The Hormel Trophy went to Engine 24 and Ladder 23 from Dorchester, and there were many utterances of "yum" and "this is delicious." In fact, the only criticism came from a high-powered PR exec and well-respected Wellesley mom who said, "Beer and wine are a no-brainer with chili, but they really oughtta have a martini bar."

All Dressed Up

Here's to the Ladies Who Lunch. At least the ones who attended Dress for Success' annual luncheon at the Fairmont Copley Plaza.

Not only was the food good, but it was hosted by luscious-to-look-at WCVB-TV Channel 5 reporter Shayna Seymour, and it was laid-back enough that more than a few of us felt comfortable availing ourselves of the wine.

Along with a handful of alpha males, there was enough high-powered estrogen to fuel Wonder Woman's invisible airplane. For example: force of nature Jacqui Budd, banking babes Vicary Graham and Joanne Jaxtimer, presidential confidante Carol Fulp, bouclé'd blonde Kristen Daly, tall drink of water Dusty Rhodes, fur-swaddled mountain lioness Mary Kakas and the indomitable Pat Kreger, to name a small fraction.

The mystery boots

The awards presentation was blessedly brief, and the awards themselves were crystal high heels, which prompted one guest to say, "I'd rather have a real pair of Manolos."

The first reader to guess which husband of a flawlessly put-together insurance executive wore the insulated L.L. Bean duck boots pictured here will win an Improper Bostonian T-shirt. It might not keep your feet dry, but you could probably use it to dry them. ✖✖✖

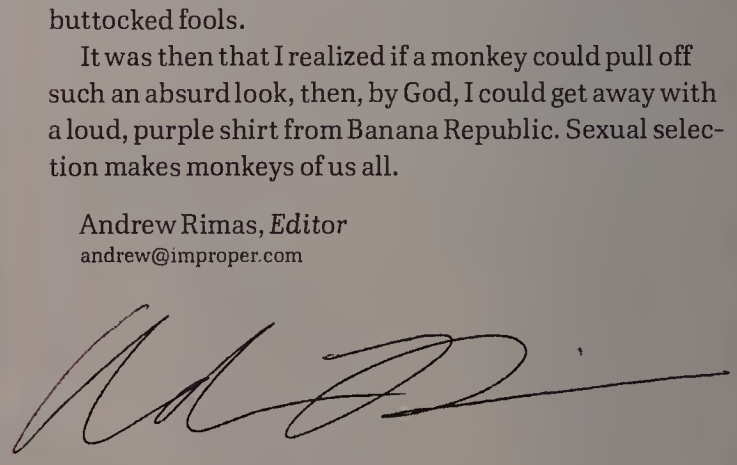
Darwin's Theory of Couture

There was a time when I thought Doc Martens paired well with shorts. I've complimented Uggs, and meant it. My goatee has weathered at least two cycles of facial hair trends, and I've publicly remarked that "fashion" is a conspiracy to extract money from people so vacuous their heads make sucking sounds when they attempt to spell. For years, I took pride in shunning a topic that's seemingly arbitrary, commercial and unmoored from reason.



But now I dress as natty as a chipmunk. I own a good tuxedo and several shirts with mother-of-pearl buttons. I have become what Shakespeare called "a flouncing jackanapes, a popinjay. A preening fop."

My Damascene moment occurred about five months ago, when I stopped in front of the mandrill exhibit at the Franklin Park Zoo. It contained a monkey with a violent blue bottom. The animal looked neither self-conscious nor upset that evolution had given it such a lurid end. In fact, it wore the color well, fully at ease in its skin and with whatever weird ideas of sexual selection they have in the jungles of Gabon. If the she-mandrill liked blue bottoms, the fellow obviously thought, blue bottoms she would have. And damn the scoffing, pasty-buttocked fools.

It was then that I realized if a monkey could pull off such an absurd look, then, by God, I could get away with a loud, purple shirt from Banana Republic. Sexual selection makes monkeys of us all.

Body of Work

FIT TO PRINT

FOR NEWBURY Street designer Daniela Corte, fashion is a family business. Her father owned a men's line in Argentina, and her first job was cutting silk for neckties. "My dad dressed the president," Corte explains. "It was very much the old-school way of dressing." After moving to the States and focusing on couture, in 2000 she switched to resort wear, a style looking to flaunt the body as much as cover it. Her work caught the national eye, and this year's Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Edition includes a Corte piece in the peacock pattern used in her 2011 collection (like the one seen here). The look shows that, despite moving from spiffy to sexy, Corte's still influenced by her roots. "I'm very much into print," she says. "I get inspired by textile."

Good Pleats

A pork bun's journey from steamer to stomach can be slippery, so deft handling is a must. At Chinatown's Dumpling Cafe, savvy diners have the technique figured out: Grab a bun (also commonly called a soup dumpling, or xiao long bao) and slide a spoon underneath. Using chopsticks, grasp the pleated twist top, take a small bite, dribble on some ginger-soy sauce, and (if manageable) savor the whole broth-gushing morsel in one slurp.

Julia Williamson

"CURATOR" OF GILTCITY.COM/BOSTON, A WEBSITE FOR LIFESTYLE AND FASHION BARGAINS

"BOSTONIANS ARE MUCH LESS SELF-CONSCIOUS and trend-driven than New Yorkers. There's less going on 'on the surface' and more depth. The city is intimate, more personal and thoughtful, and our priority is enjoyment rather than showiness. We buy into the idea of elevating life's simplest pleasures to something luxurious. A burger and a beer deal, for instance, would never fly in New York or L.A. But Bostonians are happy to see something simple refined to become something cultured." LINDSEY CANANT

SPIT IMAGE

French rotisserie meets artsy design.

GARY STRACK USES the term "gastropub" reluctantly, but when describing his latest project, it functions as a kind of gateway word. Firebrand Saints, he says, will harness the "entrepreneurial, artistic spirit" of Kendall Square and take "an elevated approach to neighborhood bar food." The menu will feature French rotisserie-style dishes, while the space will integrate "cutting-edge" art into the design of a 120-seat dining room and 60-seat patio.

Strack (owner of Central Kitchen and the Enormous Room) is excited to focus on what he calls "a totally underserved population." He adds, "These guys aren't geeks anymore." Look for a May opening.

THE TEQUILA FLOOD CONTINUES. The folks behind Temazcal Tequila Cantina hope to capitalize on the upscale Mexican dining wave by opening a 130-seat outdoor patio overlooking the harbor.

Set for a late-March launch in the Seaport area, Temazcal (named for a type of indigenous Mesoamerican sauna) will serve up traditional cuisine with Mayan, Aztec and French (yes, French) influences. If this sounds unusual, consider that chef Todd Hall—who's won two James Beard Awards—worked at La Hacienda at the Fairmont Scottsdale Princess Resort in Arizona. And consider his menu, boasting options like huitlacoche quesadillas and goat basted with grapefruit and molasses.

FROM FARM TO MASSAGE TABLE. When the Corbu Salon and Spa opens at the Charles Hotel this spring, many treatments will be based on suggestions from chef Peter Davis of Henrietta's Table. Maple in the fall, citrus in the winter, and lavender and herb for spring. Maple mani-pedi, anyone?

As winter throws the last of its bone-chilling punches, a spring-like oasis has sprung in Somerville. On Saturdays, a couple dozen farmers, fishmongers and local-food peddlers turn the Arts at the Armory building into an indoor produce playground. Fill up your reusable tote with tubs of Fiore di Nonno's cream-bathed stracciatella, unpasteurized cider from Cooks Farm Orchard and storage crops like wavy Tuscan kale and bright, sweet watermelon radishes. Don't sweat it if you're short on cash. The market manager can swipe your credit card in exchange for redeemable tokens. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Beauty

Going Up

Violet Furxhi, stylist at Salon Mario Russo, shows us how to execute her favorite buns for spring.

CLEAN SWEPT Tease hair at the root and part it down the middle. Create a tight ponytail at the middle of your head and use hairspray or wax to smooth out flyaways and to slick the hair back. Fold half the ponytail under and pin it until it's secure. Take the remaining ponytail, wrap it around the pinned half of the bun and secure it with bobby pins. Spray fine hairs under the nape of your neck and brush them up.

MESSY BUN WITH BRAID
Grab only the middle section of hair at the base of your head (leaving out some hair below and to the sides). Secure it with a hair tie. Tease this middle section to desired fullness. Bring the rest of the hair around the teased section to make one ponytail. Split into two sections and tease. Pin one section around the base of the ponytail. Wrap the second section around the first and leave out a small portion. Braid and wrap around the front of the bun. Secure with bobby pins.

LOW CHIGNON Create a deep side part by using a tail comb to zigzag through your hair (from the forehead to the crown). Wrap the hair to the parted side and make a low ponytail at the nape of the neck. Part the ponytail in two sections and wrap each section around the base of the ponytail. Secure with bobby pins.

 STYLIST'S TIP: Don't have thick hair? Use a crimper and comb it out to help add fullness to your do.*

Passing Glance

CAREY ON

Actress and Pocasset native Kristin Carey has appeared in many TV series, including Criminal Minds, Bones and The West Wing. She makes her feature film debut opposite Owen Wilson and Jason Sudeikis in Peter and Bobby Farrelly's Hall Pass.

CAT HOUSE
Kristin Carey in Hall Pass

Your character in the movie is billed as a cougar. Do you share any qualifying characteristics?
Well, I do wear a lot of leopard! And I have a sexual appetite that cannot be satiated. OK, I'm totally kidding. I love her boldness, I think we share some of that. She knows what she wants. I think I'm a little young for a cougar.

What was the audition process like for this film?
I've known the Farrelly brothers for a while. We bonded over the Red Sox, the Celtics and the Patriots. They're New England guys. They like to work with people they have a connection with, and they thought of me for this role. The set was like a lovefest.

Did anyone pull any pranks on set?
When we were filming our big sex scene, I thought it'd be funny to put on this prosthetic penis with red pubic hair and surprise the guys. Unfortunately (or fortunately) the cameras caught the whole thing. It'll be on the DVD extras.

Who'd you rather: Owen Wilson or Jason Sudeikis?
But they're both such great guys! I guess Jason, because I tend be more interested in brunets. A guy with a sense of humor is very sexy.

Drink of the Moment

An Exercise in Subtle-Tea

For better or worse, Boston and tea will always go together. But despite the fuss, all we managed was an Earl Grey–flavored harbor while Long Island manufactured their own sick salute to tea. Times are changing. Pinkies out, Boston, and bottoms up.

Going Out

Climbing Up Hill

Mention Dorchester dining to snooty urbanites and, depending on their last trip, they'll either scoff at the absurdity of the concept or recount the fabulous meal they once had at Ashmont Grill. Chef Chris Douglass pioneered the movement toward quality, community-oriented spots, and others are following suit. "We wanted to open here because we all live in the neighborhood and know the potential value," says Driscoll DoCanto, co-owner of Savin Bar and Kitchen. "The people on Savin Hill don't have something like this within walking distance."

Set to launch in early March, Savin Bar and Kitchen aims to blend the neighborhood bar and grill formula with an inventive menu helmed by chef Todd Lesakowski (of the Franklin Café and Rhode Island's Cav). "We're pulling some of the American classics out of the dark," he adds. Those dishes range from pork-shoulder confit wrapped in bacon ($19) to a simple baguette stuffed with French ham and cornichon butter ($9).

"This is definitely a neighborhood that people are interested in," says co-owner Kenneth Osherow. He's no stranger to the Hill, owning Savin Scoop, McKenna's Café and a laundry list of surrounding properties, but this will be his first foray into dinner service.

The restaurant's location is steeped in neighborhood lore; it's housed local favorite C.F. Donovan's and, earlier, the Bulldog Tavern—stomping ground of gangster Eddie "The Bulldog" Connors. Extensive renovations have added an open kitchen, tufted banquettes (reupholstered in velvet) and a reclaimed oak bar built to withstand heavy traffic. The eatery also has the only liquor license on the Hill.

Downstairs a cozy corner adjacent to the prep kitchen has been renovated, but Osherow and DoCanto are waiting to determine its fate. "We don't know what the people around here want. It could end up being a bar or a private room. Time—and the people—will tell, and then we'll give them what they need."

VISION TEST

A meditation on mediums

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

THEY SAY THERE'RE NO atheists in foxholes. By the same measure, most of us don't believe in ghosts, until we have to go down to the basement and flip the circuit breaker. Apply the right pressure and even the most rational mind will dart to illogical places.

I, myself, am an open-minded agnostic with wavering thoughts on the supernatural. My stance sounds noncommittal, but I prefer to think that I'm prudently hedging my bets. I'm not expecting to meet St. Peter or the Ghost of Christmas Past, but I won't be struck speechless should our paths cross. I don't think Molly Powers communicated with my dead relatives, but that didn't stop my hands from getting clammy.

Molly Powers is a psychic medium with an office in New York and a small, dimly lit room at Oriental Medicine in Cambridge. She describes her role as "literally the vessel between the spirit world and the psychical world." It's a grave description that belies her personality (or performance) as a cheerful young woman just trying to make good with an unasked-for gift. Put more casually (and rapidly): "Me, Molly Powers, from Lowell, Mass., raised Irish Catholic, father's in church everyday saying the rosary. What do I do with this? I don't tell him; he'll have another heart attack." Whether you view her sessions as treatment or a cheat, the woman is a hoot.

"You ready to go for a little ride?" she asked, before we called upon my grandparents. No matter the truth behind her service, it's impressive to watch Powers work. Through rapid-fire speech with the dead or the client, it's essentially storytelling through sonar. Powers quickly bounces ideas, and by reacting to your affirmations or denials, she crafts an imaginary relationship. If you wanted to, you could direct your own revelation.

Our conversations started with my paternal grandfather, a man I don't really remember. Fittingly enough, he just wanted to talk to my dad. My father's mother, whom I never met, also had little to say. But they did leave me with some months and numbers. Apparently all spirits do this, as if they want loved ones to consult their supernatural almanacs.

We moved on to my maternal grandmother, and things began to click. Powers didn't see my grandfather around, which was accurate. She said my grandmother wanted me to know that she loved our house and hated her nursing home. She explained that my grandmother kept pointing to her hip.

In real life, my grandmother entered a home after slipping on some ice. I remembered visiting and hearing her blame that small accident for the loss of her independence. Then I remembered lots of old ladies hurt their hips, and no one feels comfortable in a nursing home.

"What kind of candy did my grandma keep in her purse?" I asked, deciding to get direct. "I see something in a silver wrapper, like a Hershey's Kiss," Powers replied. I don't have much of a sweet tooth, but I owe my affinity for caramel to the sticky little squares wrapped in clear plastic grandma always kept in supply. Envisioning my grandmother's service, Powers saw arrangements of red flowers. As my mother later pointed out, "Your grandmother always said, 'Don't give me flowers when I'm dead, give me flowers when I'm alive.'" Ending with my maternal grandfather, and forgetting that she'd already left him out of the picture, Powers stated that this was the grandparent I really knew well. The man's been dead since the 1950s.

For a skeptic, the question about mediums is whether the profession is defensible or deplorable. Powers has worked as a counselor, and I don't doubt her compassion, but her clients include grieving widows and families of suicide victims. If you don't believe in her abilities, you have to acknowledge that what she's doing is lying to sad people for $175 an hour.

But clients do find comfort. Perhaps there's no real treatment, but there can be a spiritual placebo effect. It's sugar-pill therapy, but a rational mind doesn't care as long as the symptoms fade.

We lie to ourselves all the time, especially about matters of the unknown. Psychic mediums, rituals of luck or superstition, the vat of worms that is prayer; they're all attempts at finding an answer. If you pick the petals off a flower and end on "she loves me," you know that may not be the case, but it's the result you were looking for. ✖✖✖

GET AN EARFUL

TO THE KEEPER OF THE QUIET CAR:
I see you every afternoon on the Franklin commuter rail. For some reason, you've taken it upon yourself to be the sheriff of the quiet car. I appreciate the fact that the quiet car exists. Loud phone conversations are the worst after a long day. But seriously, who do you think you are? Unless you're an undercover T administrator, I think you need to shut your mouth. You're trying to keep order, but you're really just pissing everybody off. Especially me.

Better seen than heard

To the parking-lot attendant at Boston Wharf Road and Seaport Boulevard:
Your cheerful greetings more than validate the ridiculous cost that driving into the city for work accrues. You probably get to work at the crack of dawn, just to spend all day either freezing (or sweltering) in a pay booth, but you always have a smile on your face. You inspire me to be less cranky for the rest of the day. Also, you have the prettiest hair ever. What's your secret?

Motor running

To the pair of drunk guys at Paradise Rock Club on Feb. 20:
I'm sure your attitudes and penchant for Bacardi nips will take you far in life. I don't know where you grew up, but pushing little ladies like me and making threats isn't how you treat a woman. And to the bouncers who did nothing after multiple girls complained: Your hair isn't coming back anytime soon, and neither am I.

The psychology of mental boundaries

THERE ARE INVISIBLE WALLS that separate different parts of our minds, helping us categorize the world. Feelings, memory and crucial elements of identity all involve boundaries. They affect ideas of politics (us vs. them), ethnicity and art. That magical boat that rows us into the waters of sleep crosses its own mysterious boundaries, an image emblematic of many themes in this book.

Boundaries: A New Way to Look at the World
By Ernest Hartmann

The author is a professor of psychiatry at Tufts University.

Hartmann, using extensive empirical research and a questing sense of curiosity, discusses "thick boundaried" people—whose style is pragmatic, definite, rule-bound—and "thin boundaried" ones—the emotional, sometimes artistic, types who favor melting divisions. Each style has virtues and limitations, and the book's intriguing questionnaire helps you ponder your own thick- or thin-style preferences. These may be quite absolute, or circumstantial and mottled. According to Hartmann's "Amoeba Principle," people and societies thicken their boundaries when under attack. These distinctions illuminate big-picture matters, such as different ways of making peace in war or divorce. Some mental disorders have loose connections to boundaries. It's all chewy food for thought about friends, acquaintances and family. ×××

FROM PAGE 64: "A relationship between two people depends to a considerable extent on their individual boundary styles. Two people who each have thick boundaries... and are comfortable with their boundaries can sometimes form a 'thick boundary relationship.' Each of them does his or her own thing and they interact at times when they happen to have the same interests and want to do the same things together.... Two people with very thin boundaries often have an intense but stormy relationship. They may feel wonderfully close, but sometimes too close. They may become almost merged. One of them may feel that the other is invading or taking over."

Foundry on Elm duplicates the brasserie trend.

FROND MEMORIES Herbs and preserved lemon boost the seared scallop entree.

DAVIS SQUARE HAS A LOT to offer: a great movie theater/concert venue, a Goodwill store with an impressive book section, a solid Irish pub and decent BBQ, and, of course, Gargoyles on the Square—the city's best experimental, fine-dining venue fronted by a reality-TV runner-up. But to judge by the popularity of Foundry on Elm, what Davis Square was missing was a brasserie in the mold of Gaslight, Eastern Standard and Russell House Tavern—a place specializing in fancy cocktails and steak frites. From its menu layout to its red-leather banquettes and marble-top bar, Foundry unabashedly conforms to the Eastern Standard template. Too bad the food is only a dim shadow of its inspiration.

Foundry is upfront about its objective. The waitress cheerfully informed us, "We're trying to be a brasserie meets gastropub." But on a Friday night, the 200-person space instead resembled a brasserie meets sports bar. Practically every wall surface in the bar area is hung with flat-screens—even the bathroom has a TV over the sink so you won't miss a crucial play. The music jarringly leapt between reggae and club tracks. In back, the ambience was more subdued, with booths shielding out the din. If you have a preference on noise levels, be sure to specify your choice when making a reservation. Alas, both times we sat in the Señor Frog section.

Of the appetizers, I enjoyed the assorted farm-stand pickles ($6), which included green beans, red peppers, celery root and carrots. Though the brine was too sour, the vibrant taste of the vegetables compensated for the mouth-puckering tartness. Crab cakes ($13) were also a solid choice. Packed with tender crab instead of filler and lightly coated with panko, they easily broke apart at the touch of a fork and paired well with a corn relish. Less successful was the raw bar plateau ($45), a large platter of oysters, littleneck clams, shrimp and Jonah crab claws accompanied by a small plate of tuna tartare. Perhaps the shellfish weren't in their prime or had been sitting on ice too long, but they tasted frosty and dull.

The two biggest disappointments among the entrees were the shrimp etouffée ($18) and the steak frites ($19). Although the shrimp were perfectly cooked, the etouffée was astoundingly bland for a dish that should be well-seasoned and spicy. The sauce tasted like flour and hardly anything else; I felt tempted to take up the waitress' offer to replace it with another selection when she saw my untouched dish. My companion's steak, requested medium, arrived raw and cold. When the kitchen returned it to the stove, they overcorrected and dried it into leather. Far better than the steak frites was a savory New York strip ($26), which came with a hearty portobello hash, broccolini and bourbon demi-glace. But the pan-seared scallops ($20) were the best dish I tasted. The sweet, sea-redolent meat was enhanced by a fennel-leek soubise, beluga lentils and preserved lemon. Tiny fronds of fennel lent both flair and a subtle licorice flavor that combined beautifully with the shellfish.

Like the rest of the meal, desserts were mixed. A crème brûlée with vanilla shortbread ($7) would've been delicious if it hadn't come out refrigerator-cold, caramelized crust and all. The Baileys cheesecake ($7) was a generous serving with chocolate-mint sauce and Baileys crème Anglaise, a real treat for those who like their cheesecake dense.

Foundry has an extensive drink menu. Both of my cocktails, Old Granddad's Cherry and the Ginger Smash ($9.25 each), tasted light on alcohol and heavy on syrup. With more than 23 drafts, including Dogfish Head 60 Minute IPA ($5.50), I recommend skipping the overpriced cocktails and getting a pint instead.

Although no entree on the menu tops $26, I was still surprised by how steep the check was in relation to the quality of food. Foundry on Elm is a sound option if you're already in Davis Square and have a craving for brasserie fare. But there's no need to make a special trip. ×××

ALL CLASS

How an alumni magazine update should really read.

Read more at improper.com/blogs.

EVERY THREE MONTHS, when my college's alumni magazine arrives, the first thing I do is scan the boldfaced names in the class news section. I'm not sure why. Thanks to Facebook, I have a pretty good idea of what my fellow alumni are doing. Recently, I even saw one of my classmates on TV during a presidential address. I'm unclear on the exact nature of his job, but there was one moment when Obama looked in his direction for approval, at which point he nodded. As a friend admitted in an e-mail, seeing one of our contemporaries hobnobbing with the president on national TV caused him to experience "a serious 'what the f have I been doing with myself since college?' moment." He dealt with the sudden shock of introspection the same way I would—by changing channels and watching South Park instead.

Which brings me back to my college magazine. Every so often I get an e-mail saying, "Tell us what you've been doing lately, and we'll run it in the class news column." I've never responded. On one hand, I don't flatter myself by thinking that anyone cares where I live or who I saw at what wedding. On the other, my inveterate need to boast isn't really satisfied by my current circumstances. I don't merely want to inform my classmates about my life. I want to punish them with it and make them feel bad about themselves. Otherwise, what's the point?

To that end, I've drafted a class news update for myself. The following might not all be true, technically, but lots of people exaggerate on their résumés. I think of this less as fact and more as the roadmap to success that I'm avidly pursuing. So here's what everyone's missed since we collected our diplomas.

EZRA DYER tells us that after college, he worked as a ski bum. Specifically, he designed the popular Aspen program wherein rich people use the indigent as skis—hence the term. "My skis were chattering today, so I gave them some Thunderbird wine and they settled right down," reported an enthusiastic customer named Oprah.

I don't merely want to inform my classmates about my life. I want to punish them with it.

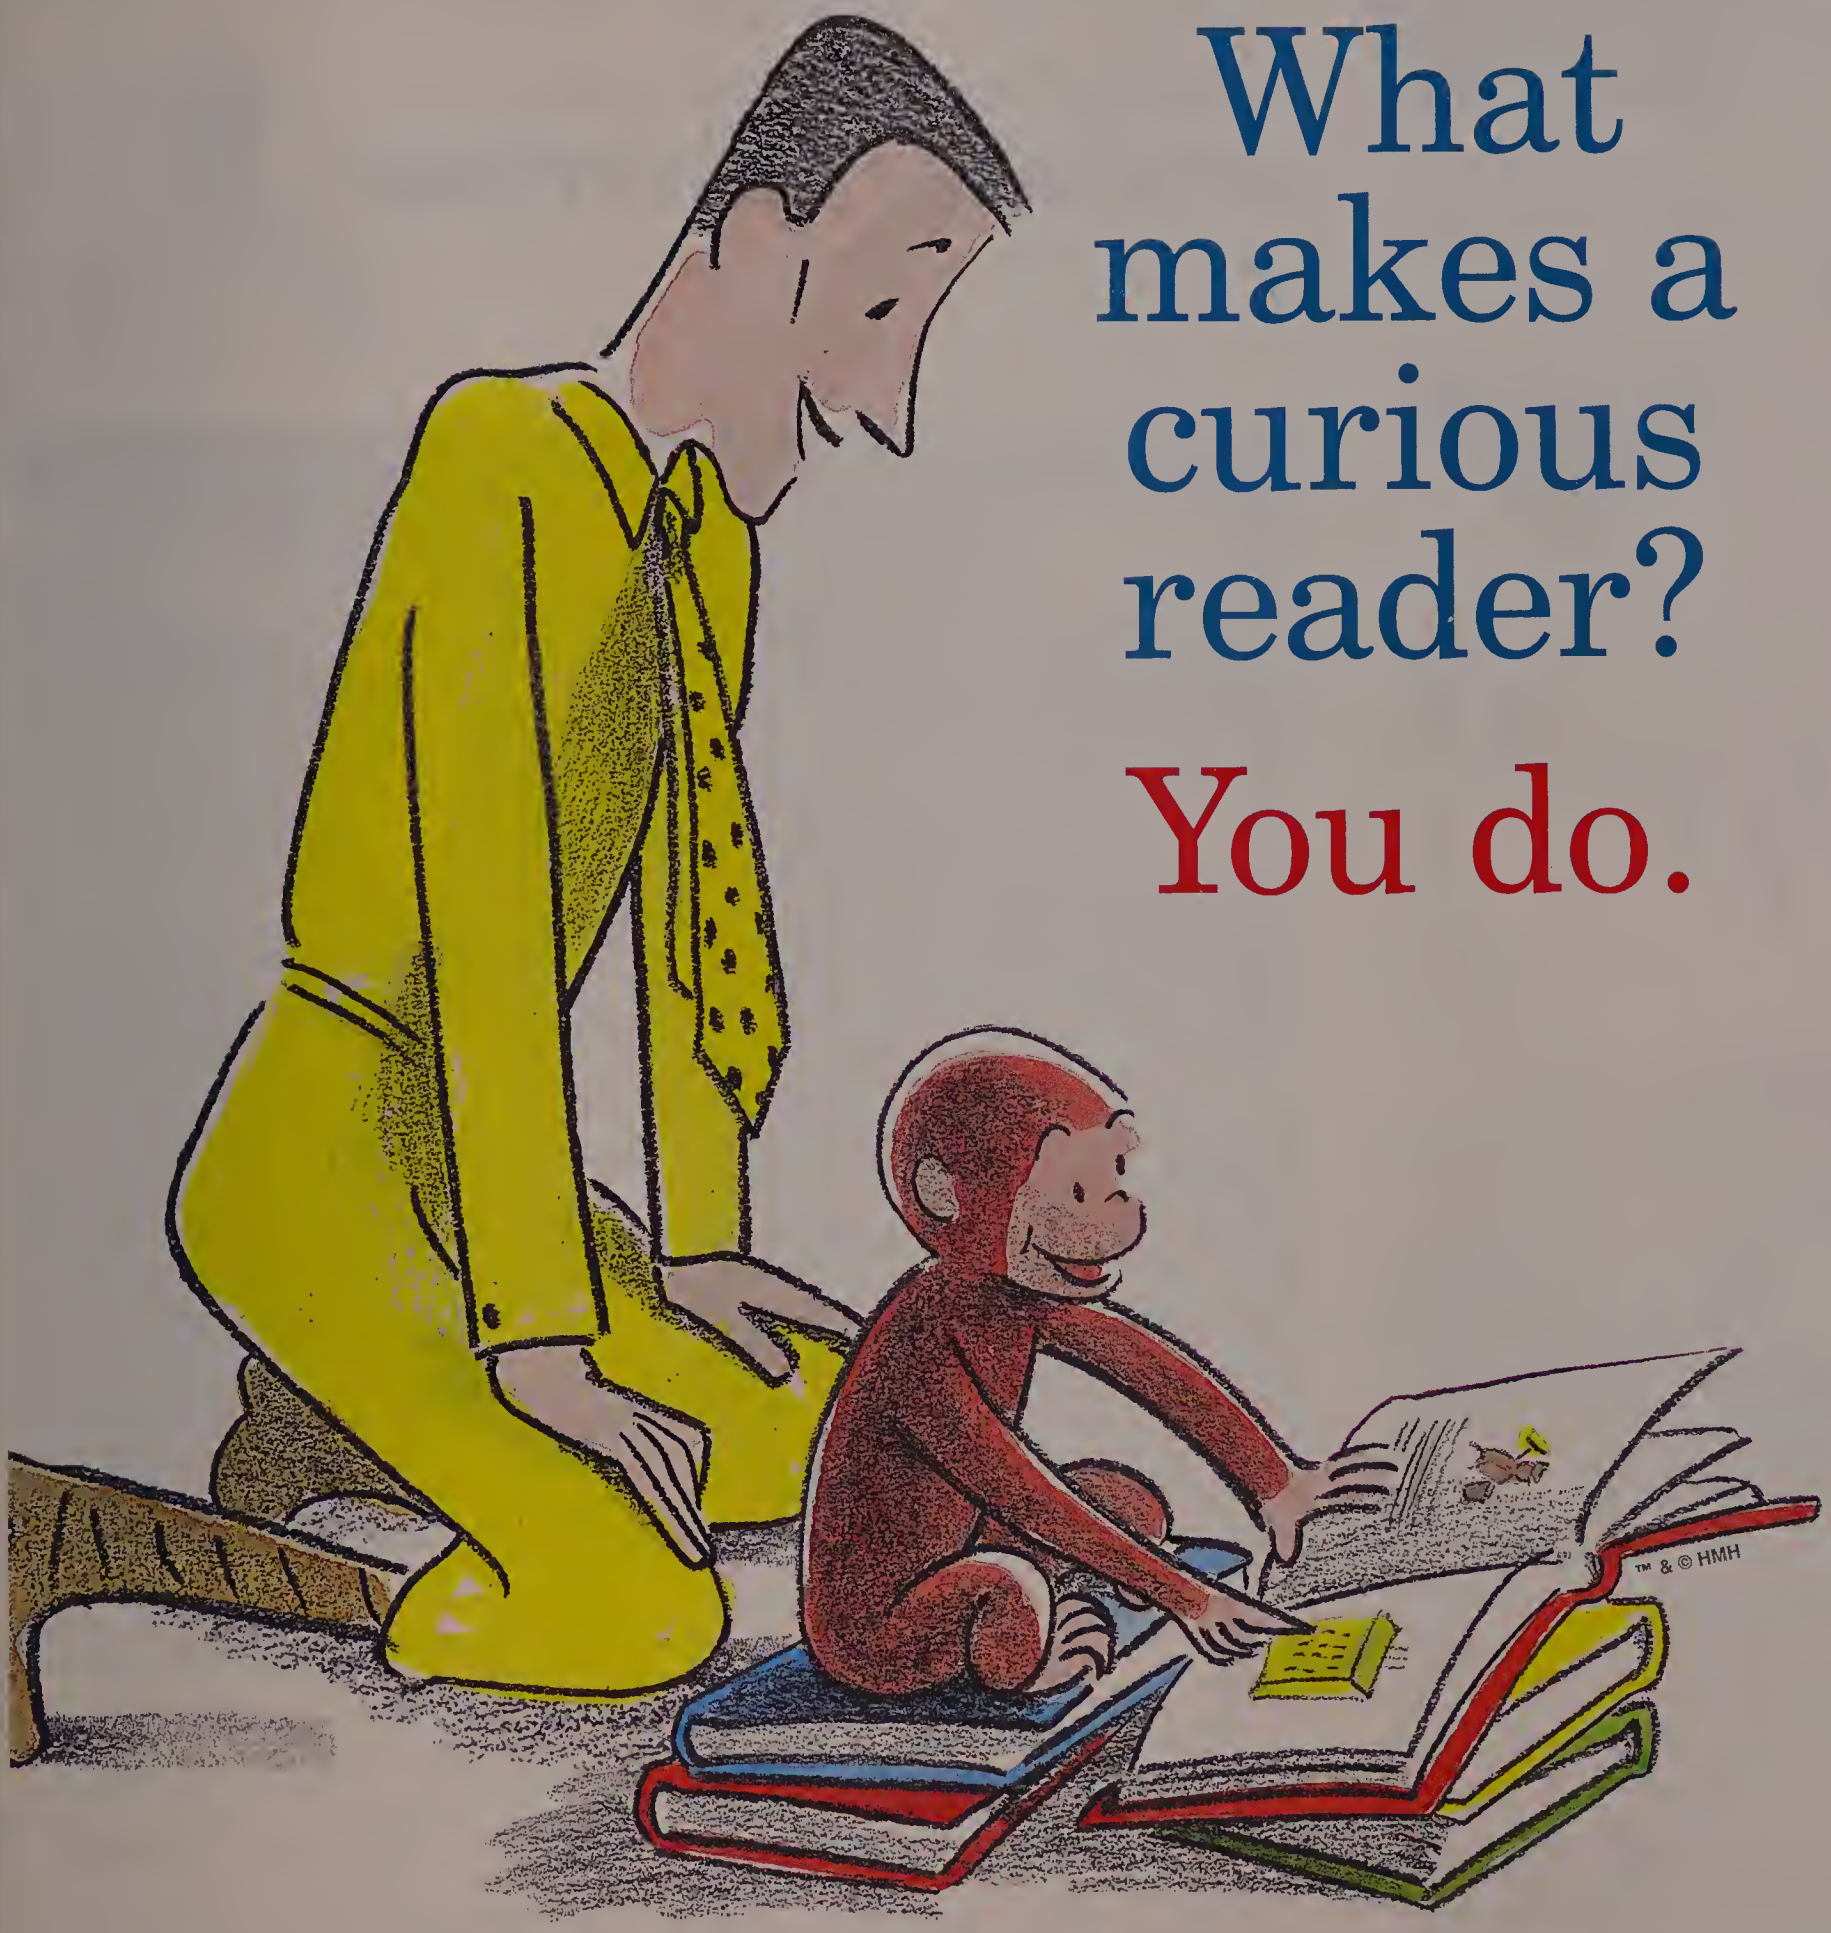
Ezra soon moved to Boston, where he assumed a condescending attitude toward Northeast ski resorts. "Stowe is pretty good," he'd tell girls at the Beacon Hill Pub. "It reminds me of the bottom 10 percent of Crested Butte, down near the parking lots."

While working on his JD/PhD/MBA in legal business biochemistry, Ezra found the time to write a critically acclaimed history of cottage cheese and all its dwelling-themed-cheese predecessors—cabin cheese, bungalow cheese and refurbished-condo cheese. He's also developed a new lightweight cottage cheese, so you can save money at salad bars that charge by the pound.

In 2006, he thought of a new source of energy that would be infinite, cheap and nonpolluting. Then he forgot what it was. He didn't worry about remembering, because that wasn't even the best idea he had that day. The best idea was a concept for a reality show about a group of depraved steroid-abusers in New Jersey. He pitched the show as "The Real World meets HBO's Real Sex meets Shrek." We know it now, of course, as Hard Knocks Season 6: The New York Jets.

Last month, while on a trip to see the pyramids in Egypt, Ezra casually told a cab driver, "Hosni Mubarak displeases me." Just saying.

On another recent trip, Ezra was detained at the airport on suspicion that he was smuggling three pythons. It turned out that two of them were just his arms.



The third? That was a Madagascan ground boa. Ezra explained that he trained it to tow his carry-on luggage, thus leaving his hands free to practice kung fu. The security people then presented him with a MacArthur Genius Grant and let him fly the plane to his destination, which was a private island on the moon.

In 2008, Ezra created a novelty product called the Mandelier, a chandelier fitted with hooks to hang tools, remote controls and bottle openers. It wasn't any stupider than the Shake Weight.

Ezra's wife recently got her body-fat measured. The result came back in the range for "elite athlete." This is true, actually. Ezra's not sure how this information is relevant to class news; he just wanted to brag.

Currently, Ezra's busy testing the iPhone 5 for Apple. Thanks to his suggestions, the birds are now 60 percent angrier. Sure, the holoscanner could use a higher farkle rate, but as Ezra told Steve Jobs, nobody's perfect. Well, almost nobody. ✖✖✖

SIMPLY ROUTINE

For Ray Allen, practice makes perfect.

TO PARAPHRASE NBA-great Allen Iverson, "We talkin' about practice. Not a game. We talkin' about practice."

Everyone remembers this oft-played rant that originated after Iverson and his former head coach, Larry Brown, were banging heads due to the All-Star's "poor" practice habits. Iverson's argument to the media was that when the whistle blew on game day, nobody in the league played harder than he did, as he sacrificed his tiny body for his team. He was right. He put it all on the line. But Iverson missed the point.

Fast-forward almost a decade ahead and we have a rebuttal to Iverson. The other Allen: Ray, the poster boy for practice.

Sure, Allen has been a star talent from the day we first saw his name in University of Connecticut box scores. He was one of the best athletes in the country coming out of high school. But there were dozens of players just like him.

The goal wasn't just to make the NBA, but to become great. Talk about a self-fufilling prophecy.

"There were a lot of guys as talented as I was, even more talented," Allen said recently. "But they didn't want to take their games to the next level.... And you do that by practicing."

So much in athletics is about repetition. Just watch Dustin Pedroia taking 100 grounders a day at second base. Watch Tom Brady throw the same pass with the same follow through, over and over, on the practice field behind Gillette Stadium.

Chris Collins is a sportscaster for New England Cable News. Contact him at chris@improper.com.

I saw Allen's dedication firsthand when I was a cub TV sports reporter in Milwaukee and he landed with the Bucks after the 1996 NBA Draft. (FYI: The Celtics took Antoine Walker with the following pick. Damn!) I got to witness the maturation of that silky, smooth shot. In fact, the only thing that looks different from then to now is the hair. Allen no longer has any.

His routine remains the same. Go to a Celtics game three hours before tip-off and you'll see the repetition. You'll see Ray shooting dozens of threes from all angles, some 200 shots in all. He can knock down 170 when he's really got it going. He pushes ball boys to their limit.

Allen says his practice and pregame shooting program was developed by one of his assistant coaches at UConn. Even then, his goal wasn't just to make the NBA, but to become great. Talk about a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Allen's routine has created a consistency like none other. His recent breaking of Reggie Miller's all-time three-pointers record was like a holiday around here. I don't think I've ever seen a big Celtics vs. Lakers game in which the result wasn't the primary focus. This was Ray's night. And he let all of us celebrate with him.

Allen's professionalism has also played into his longevity. He never had the posse or the groupies. Allen has always treated his NBA career like a job, which means he goes to work. That's a remarkable feat considering the off-the-record secrets we hear about the NBA road-trip lifestyle. Booze and babes are everywhere. Both of them are practice-killers. Allen, though, fends them off. He doesn't drink. And his family—his wife Shannon and their four kids—remain foremost on his mind.

"Family is everything to me," said Allen, after breaking Miller's record.

Oftentimes, when I've run into Allen, basketball is not the topic of discussion. We usually talk golf.

If you know anything about golf, practice isn't everything; it's the only thing. I once asked him what his handicap was. He told me "scratch." For the rookies out there, that's a zero, which means he can shoot par on the courses you and I hack away at. In other words, he can play with the professionals. I've heard rumblings that he might be a future Champions Tour competitor when he hits the age of 50. I wouldn't be surprised. Ray always has been, and always will be, a genuine pro.

For now, though, he's property of the Boston Celtics, and, at 35 years old, his best basketball may still be ahead of him. We all know he'll be putting in the practice. ✖✖✖

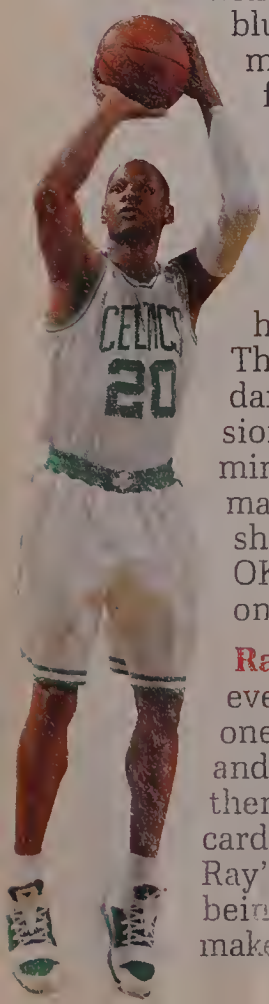
ON BLAKE, BRANDON, RONDO AND CLAY

2 SOX THOUGHTS

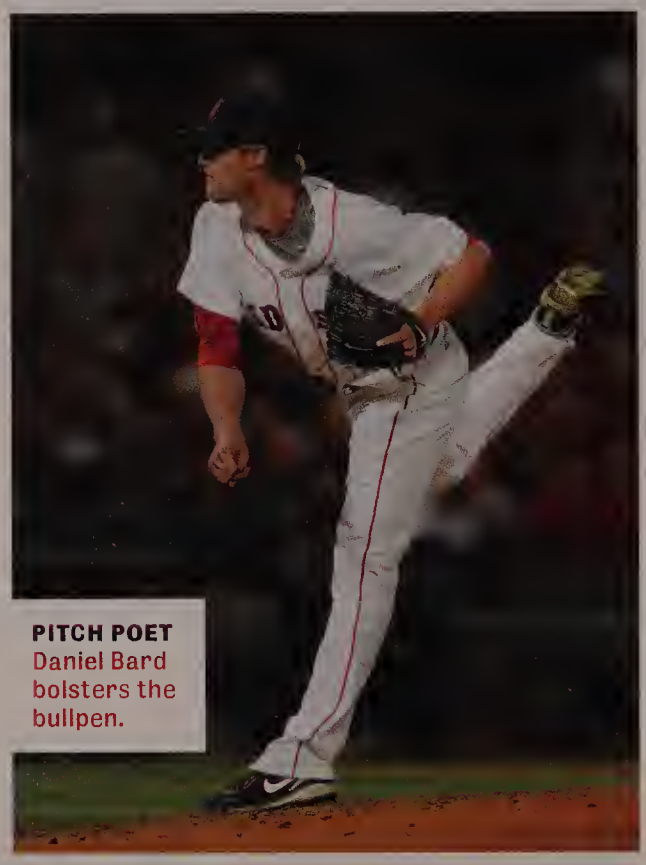


Tough Draw Can't wait for Opening Day, right? Obviously, but it's a bit of a buzz kill to see the Rangers have already named CJ Wilson their starter. The same CJ Wilson who went 3-0 with a 0.86 ERA in three starts against the Sox last season. And not to make matters worse (OK, that's a lie), but Carl Crawford's a career .167 hitter against Wilson.

Speaking of Opening Day I know, as Tito would say, a lot can happen between now and Opening Day. But if I were the manager, I'd be giving the ball to Clay Buchholz. I know it's not that easy, but Clay's the future, and showing him that level of confidence and respect will take his game to another level.

3 Alternative Careers

IF THE NBA AND NFL DO TAKE TIME OFF, THERE ARE OTHER JOB OPTIONS...



Brandon Meriweather, Duck Tour Guide No offense to any Duck Tour drivers out there, but you guys are a strange breed. And who better to join your club than Mr. Big Bang Clock himself. He could call himself Beantown Brandon and drive around in a leopard-print suit with a peacock-feather cap, blurting out inaccurate information. "Now look over there, folks. That neighborhood's called Bacon Hole!"

Glen Davis, Day Care Come on, like you wouldn't sign your kid up for Big Baby Day Care? It'd be the happiest place on Earth. There'd be nonstop singing and dancing, tons of snuggle sessions, candy breaks every 30 minutes and a daily performance where Baby takes his shirt off and does the Dougie. OK, maybe you want to hold off on sending the application.

Ray Allen, PGA Pro I'm not even messing around on this one. Ray's already a filthy golfer, and if he sets his OCD mind to it, there's no doubt he'd earn his card. Golf's a game of habit, and Ray's the most habitual human being ever. Plus, you know he'd make it rain on those par threes.

5 RANDOM STORYLINES

PITCH POET Daniel Bard bolsters the bullpen.

Making Moves Sadly, this column went to press before the NBA and NHL trade deadlines had passed. At the time, the Celtics had done nothing, but thankfully the Bruins were active enough for both teams. In Kelly, Kaberle and Peverley (don't you love hockey names?) the B's not only brought in three quality guys but players who fit exactly what the team needs. That strange feeling you have right now? It's that the NHL deadline's over, and for once there's nothing to bitch about.

Coaching Carousel Over the last five months, Jeff Fisher, Jerry Sloan and Bobby Cox, the longest-tenured coaches in their respective sports, all left their posts. That's a sign of the times, but also a reminder of how lucky we are in Boston. Currently, Doc Rivers is the longest-tenured coach in the East. Bill Belichick's longest-tenured in the AFC. Claude Julien's tied for second in the East. Terry Francona's tied for third in the AL. That's impressive stuff.

Fix Is In I loved watching Blake Griffin dunk over a car, but I hated the dunk contest. Why? Because it was fixed. There was too much planning involved; too many ad dollars on the line. The whole thing was choreographed from start to finish, essentially making the contest a baby step above the WWE. The least they could've done was hit Cheryl Miller with a folding chair.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/4: Note to the Pats: Don't forget anything important in the locker room. It's lockout time.

3/8: The last time the Bruins and Canadiens met, they produced what Bill Walton would call the most epic hockey game in the history of all eternity. For once, he wouldn't be exaggerating. Tonight, they face off in Montreal. Encore, please.

3/9: Blake Griffin comes to town. Let's hope the Celtics didn't trade for a Kia.

SEND FEEDBACK TO RICH@IMPROPER.COM AND READ MORE AT CSNNE.COM.

1 ONE BIRTHDAY NOTE

When Rajon Rondo turned 25 on Feb. 22, he had 2,667 career assists. Or to put it another way, 1,071 more than John Stockton had when he turned 25. Startling stat, but don't get carried away. Rondo needs to average 10 assists a game through 2027 to even sniff Johnny Nut-Hugger's assists record.

Pen Pals The Sox offense got most of the off-season love, justifiably, but the bullpen is what may ultimately make their season. You remember how awful the relievers were last year? Remember the nights you spent pining for the days of Heathcliff Slocumb and BK "the Finger" Kim"? OK, maybe it wasn't that bad, but with Jonathan Papelbon, Bobby Jenks, Dan Wheeler and Daniel Bard—who may break out beyond them all—the water-bottle drummers will be making sweet music in 2011.

Strike Season Maybe it's too early to panic, considering we still have six months until the void might really be felt. But it could be time to start considering what life would be like next fall without the NFL or NBA.... OK, now I'm depressed. Let's move on.

Soroff On SALLY LAPOINTE

The designer chats about sparkly tops, status symbols and Lady Gaga wearing her work.

THE FASHION WORLD'S RECENTLY ANOINTED IT-GIRL, SALLY LAPOINTE, 26, was born and raised in Marblehead and graduated from the Rhode Island School of Design in 2006. After moving to New York and designing accessories for Swank, LaPointe and her best friend and business partner, Sarah Adelson, launched their first line, S.Love, in 2008. When it failed to sprout wings, they rebooted and launched Sally LaPointe, presenting their debut collection to enthusiastic reviews during New York's Fashion Week last year. When Lady Gaga appeared at a trade show in Las Vegas wearing a jersey dress by LaPointe, the designer generated major buzz. Her second collection, which she showed last month, garnered critical raves. She lives in New York.

Jonathan Soroff: After Fashion Week, what do you do for an encore?
Sally LaPointe: Right after the show, I started working on the next collection. I just put my head down and try not to look too far into the future.

How did Lady Gaga affect things for you?
It created a lot of buzz, which is great. It generates attention, which, at this point in the game, is pretty important for us.

Isn't buzz what fashion is largely about?
Yes. Very true.

How did it feel when you learned her stylist had picked your dress?
I heard about it late at night. My publicist called, and my phone started going off. I wasn't even aware that it was a possibility. I didn't know it had been pulled for her. So first I was shocked and then very excited.

Any desire to travel in a giant plastic egg carried by hot-looking aliens?
No. But God bless her. She keeps pushing that envelope, and I think what she's doing is brilliant.

So is Marblehead a hotbed of fashion?
Not particularly.

Designer you admire most, living or dead?
I really identify with Rodarte. What [Kate and Laura Mulleavy] have done is what I aspire to do. They've created this whole kind of world for themselves. I really look up to them as a company, and their image.

Did you do any awards-season red-carpet stuff?
Not so far. But we usually don't hear until it's already happened. Things can get pulled, and then not get used.

Personal style icon?
Daphne Guinness. I think she's rad.

New York versus Boston?
The biggest thing about New York is that day to day and everywhere you go, people put so much energy into being that super-stylish, forward dresser. I'd say Boston's streets are a lot cleaner, though.

Anyone you'd never want to see wearing one of your designs?
[Laughs.] Good question. Any of the Real Housewives. [Laughs.]

Who's the chicest person you know?
My mother.

How long before you're designing furniture, or a line for Wal-Mart, or paper plates?
I'd say something like that would happen maybe in five years? I need to create a stronger name for myself.

Favorite fashion magazine?
I like Dazed & Confused.

Single favorite item in your wardrobe?
My black Rick Owens leather jacket.

Do you consider yourself well-dressed?
I like simplicity and a lot of black, and that's what I wear every day.

What should be in every woman's wardrobe?
Black leather jacket, black leggings and a pair of six-inch black stiletto boots.

Is there really anything new in fashion, or do designers just endlessly recycle older stuff?
Fashion is about your interpretation, and if you come up with something that's "new," it comes from the whole story, not particularly the garment itself. Yes, a shirt is a shirt. But it's what you put with the shirt and the story behind it.

Did your show during Fashion Week translate into sales?
I think so. Right after, we got write-ups in Women's Wear Daily, Style.com, Italian Vogue and New York magazine. That didn't happen the season before. I'm hoping the sales follow.

What do you have that other young designers don't?
Besides luck? Maybe a narrative sense. The show is as important as each garment, and that might set me apart.

What do you think of the status-symbol aspect of fashion, like Louis Vuitton luggage?
I can understand it. I can't afford it. [Laughs.] It's one of those things that naturally happens when you come up with something really great.

Do you do thrift shops or vintage?
No. I'm not against it. But I'm not a big hunter for those kinds of things.

Stupidest current trend?
Well, I'd say Uggs, but it's so obvious by now. Or sparkly bar tops? The sparkly tops girls wear out to bars.

Era in fashion history you most would've liked to live through.
The '70s would've been cool 'cause it was all about [being a] free spirit, do whatever you want.

What would you never be caught dead wearing?
A Snuggie.

In three adjectives, describe your personal aesthetic.
Modern, feminine and aggressive.

How would you do on Project Runway*?*
Not well. I don't work well in that kind of atmosphere. I need to be by myself, in my zone. I take my time, and I need to get into my own head. I couldn't do that with cameras and all those people. ✖✖✖

STYLE PROFILE / by Amanda Knorr

I have a great tailor named Roy from Rite Way, who I credit for my clothing. I think one of the secrets to fashion is to have a great tailor.

I got this dress for $60 at the Brimfield Antique Fair. I bought red fabric from Windmill—this great fabric store in Chinatown—and Roy replaced the panels because crinoline can get weak. He's been tailoring my vintage since I was 25.

My whole family has very fine hair, and I don't think everyone should have long hair. I've had short hair for half my life now. I like to offset it with feminine clothes.

I go to Salon Luna in Porter for the cut. I get the color from Herbal Essences off of Amazon, and I don't use the whole bottle. I'll mix it in a dish to make it last.

This necklace is from the Union Square Yard Sale in Somerville.

Someone told me I look like I'm on top of a music box with this dress.

Each year for my birthday I have a color-themed party. Last year it was red, and I wore this dress.

I also wore it for Halloween to be the Queen of Hearts.

These shoes are from the '60s. I love silver shoes from that time.

ON THE MARKET

AFTER ITS WINTER hiatus, the Independent Designer's Market re-opens in Harvard Square. Local T-shirt creator Kimberly Benson launched this weekly fashion and art bazaar to provide an alternative to plaid button-downs and chain-store khakis. Vendors sell everything from jackets to jewelry, photographs to furniture—you might even find a deal on a bicycle or a cupcake. Be advised, potential shoppers: Bring folding money. Your Gap card is no good here.

Homegrown

All in the Family The menu at Garden at the Cellar relies heavily on fresh herbs and ripe vegetables, an approach that chef Will Gilson owes to his mother, Jodie. Sadly, she lost many of her greenhouses during the recent snow storms, but Gilson's giving back by organizing "Mother's Day in March," a pop-up restaurant at the Boston Center for Adult Education aiming to help rebuild her business. On March 5, Gilson will be joined by fellow chefs Andy Husbands, Jamie Bissonnette and others, all of whom will be preparing some of Jodie's favorite dishes. Gives new meaning to the phrase "growing up." Hilary White

On Pointe

Straight and Narrow With all the recent squawking about black swans, it's good to be reminded of ballet in its natural state. Romantic love, not psychosis and bird allusions, is the theme of Beauty Strange, the latest work from José Mateo Ballet Theatre. In it, classic movements mix with contemporary choreography to explore the inner workings of modern relationships. Hearts leap at the Sanctuary Theatre through March 13.

Biutiful ★ ½ The Bataan Death March of art-directed sorrow, director Alejandro González Iñárritu's fourth feature wallows in hopelessness, rubbing your nose in filth, sadness and despair so suffocating it becomes comical. Javier Bardem stars as Uxbal, a two-bit hustler just barely scraping by on the ugly side of Barcelona and attempting to rescue his kids from their abusive, bipolar mother. She's a part-time hooker who's also sleeping with Uxbal's sleazy, obese brother when she's not busy slapping around the children. Uxbal also happens to be dying of prostate cancer… and can talk to dead people. But that doesn't figure into the story as much as you might expect. Or really, at all. For all his formal brio, Iñárritu is at a complete artistic dead end, fixated on the inherent nobility of suffering without a larger point to make. Biutiful lumbers toward a preordained, pitiless conclusion without a single organizing idea or overarching theme besides the uninspired notion that life can really suck sometimes, and eventually you die. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Blue Valentine ★★★★ The ghost of John Cassavetes looms large over writer/director Derek Cianfrance's second feature. Blue Valentine is a vicious little number, charting the courtship and dissolution of a marriage, often in alternating scenes. Whiplashing from the dizzying heights of adolescent infatuation back to middle-age sadness, the movie somehow captures both the euphoria of attraction and the hellish claustrophobia of a failed relationship. It's exasperating, infuriating and something very special. Ryan Gosling stars as Dean, a swaggering bad-boy who likes to drink beer for breakfast but really has a heart of gold. The only person in the world who sees this is Michelle Williams' Cindy, a local girl who's been around the block a few times. The connection between Dean and Cindy is at first electric, then deadening. Though sometimes too schematic in its construction, the movie is brutal and unwavering in its depiction of a love affair running out of steam until there's nothing left but hurt. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Cedar Rapids ★★ ½ A stunted man-child's journey (The Office's Ed Helms) from a small town to a medium-sized city for an insurance convention begins by mining lame hick humor, like Helms' gobsmacked awe at economy-motel accommodations. But director Miguel Arteta's latest feature gets better as it goes along, thanks mostly to the contributions of a stellar supporting cast. Helms' good-natured rube slowly brings out the best in his sad-sack colleagues, who swarm to the annual industry gathering as an excuse to drink heavily in soul-deadening chain restaurants and party hard as a vacation from their miserable lives and collapsed dreams. An unrecognizable Anne Heche costars as a disarmingly matter-of-fact adulteress, but the movie belongs to John C. Reilly as a bloated backslapper who laughs way too loud at his own vulgar jokes. Reilly is an Arthur Miller character for the Apatow era. Too bad Cedar Rapids slinks away from his despair in favor of a formulaic happy ending. His performance deserved a braver movie. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Company Men ★★ Acclaimed TV director John Wells' feature debut deals with the plight of downsized business execs, but with around 10 percent of the country out of work, it's tough to feel torn up about Ben Affleck having to sell his Porsche. Despite the contributions of brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins, The Company Men has a distinctly small-screen sensibility, often feeling like an entire season of one of Wells' polished dramas (ER, The West Wing) whittled

MEMORY LOSS

An excess of sci-fi muck hampers Matt Damon's momentum.

The Adjustment Bureau ★★
Starring Matt Damon, Emily Blunt, John Slattery, Anthony Mackie and Terence Stamp. Based on a short story by Philip K. Dick. Written and directed by George Nolfi. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

NOT TOO LONG AGO, A coworker asked me to name my favorite actor "right now." He looked baffled when I answered, "Matt Damon."

Granted, we're not talking about the pantheon here—the Brandos, Pacinos and De Niros. Who has time to wrestle with the problematic legacies they've left behind? The "right now" in his query prompted me to shoot from the hip, thinking, off the top of my head, whose pictures I look forward to seeing the most, at this particular moment.

My answer surprised me, too. But I guess that's Damon's gift. He's always rock-solid, yet we always seem surprised. One terrific performance after another for 15 years, and still we're constantly saying the same thing to our friends,

"You know who's really good in this movie? Matt Damon."

Damon will probably never hit the operatic heights of Daniel Day-Lewis or the soulful aches of Javier Bardem. He's a much sturdier, lower-key performer. He's more like Burt Lancaster or Paul Newman, the kind of actor who's appreciated more as the years go by. It takes people a while to catch on to dependable excellence, especially when you're not making a big fuss about yourself.

Another reason I like Damon so much is that he doesn't make garbage. It would've been very easy for him to follow his buddy Ben Affleck's model and cash in on that Good Will Hunting heat with a lot of brain-dead blockbusters, but you'll never find Damon working for Michael Bay. He gravitates towards offbeat projects with distinguished pedigrees, racking up a résumé that includes many of today's most exciting directors. Even his bad movies are interesting, and always made for adults.

The Adjustment Bureau is that kind of bad movie. It's a classy flop: All its sins are of ambition. The film is at least attempting something unconventional without talking down to the audience. True to form, there's a deeply committed Damon performance, which happens to be the best thing about it. But even I have to admit that the film stinks.

Based on a short story by Philip K. Dick, whose brain-twisting existential malaise has been adapted for everything from Blade Runner to Total Recall to Minority Report, The Adjustment Bureau stars Damon as David Norris, a cocky young politician. He's got a history of bar fights and frat-boy loutishness, but that's not going to keep him from angling for a New York Senate seat. A distracting amount of cameos litter the opening reels, as most of our exposition is delivered via Jon Stewart during Norris' appearance on The Daily Show, and even more crucial plot information is explained on Meet the Press by James Carville and Mary Matalin. It's an impressive game of political Where's Waldo?, but hardly the stuff of drama.

This potentially interesting story is torpedoed by exposition-heavy claptrap.

In the men's room rehearsing his concession speech, Damon's Norris meets a blowsy party-crasher played by Emily Blunt, kicking off a delightful back-and-forth of screwball banter. First-time director George Nolfi plays with the cavernous space of a hotel bathroom, doubling up on mirrors, pushing in for intimacy, and basically cutting together one of the funniest, most offhandedly sexy scenes you'll see this year. These two crazy, impetuous kids clearly belong together. Too bad the science-fiction plot says otherwise.

Enter the Adjustment Bureau, a collection of awesome character actors in fedoras clomping around en masse, bumping into people and causing so-called coincidences that rupture the patterns of the CGI graphs appearing in their antiquated notebooks. Answering to somebody called the Chairman, who's supposed to maybe be God, they work like trench-coat-clad angels, taking orders from memos delivered in faded manila envelopes.

Soon this potentially interesting story is torpedoed by exposition-heavy claptrap. Most of The Adjustment Bureau's screentime is spent with one great actor after another (John Slattery, Anthony Mackie, finally even the legendary Terence Stamp) sitting down with Damon and explaining, for the umpteenth time, that he's not allowed to go home and have amazing sex with Emily Blunt because that'll disrupt the Chairman's plan. Then they get up and chase each other around again.

In some scenes, Bureau members can merely point with their finger and shatter somebody's foot. In others, they have to run after them. Their superpowers are arbitrary depending on the whims of the plot, which is all just an excuse for more classically Dick-ish debates on predetermination versus free will. And apparently magic fedoras allow access through secret doorways that teleport you across entire city blocks.

But you know who's really good in this movie? Matt Damon. ✖✖✖ down to feature length. It also feels inauthentic, a combination of talking points and statistics missing the grace notes of real-life experience. Adding to the ersatz pallor is Hollywood's recent, unfortunate affinity for terrible Boston accents. Like an English drawing-room drama spoken in Cockney slang, The Company Men's moneyed, white-collar MBA's all drop their R's and bellow profanity like extras from The Fighter. (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

The Fighter ★★★ A low-budget labor of love for producer/star Mark Wahlberg, The Fighter follows The Town and Conviction in last year's Massachusetts Lampoon Show, in which glamorous movie stars drop their R's and wear tacky clothes to convey "authenticity." Blue-collar Bostonian has replaced redneck as Hollywood's white-trash signifier of choice. Based on the true story of Lowell boxing legend "Irish" Micky Ward, the film stars Wahlberg as the long-suffering anchor of a spectacularly dysfunctional family. As his troubled brother, Christian Bale bellows into the camera—bug-eyed with rotten teeth—and gives the kind of terrible performance that wins Academy Awards. But The Fighter turns out to be a pretty good movie, especially when Bale is off-screen. The film never strays too far from traditional sports-movie formula, but director David O. Russell imbues the clichés with manic energy, shooting from unexpected angles and eliciting subtle, heartfelt performances from Wahlberg and Amy Adams, who hold the center of this circus with quiet dignity. It gets better as it goes along. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Green Hornet ★★ ½ Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind director Michel Gondry has such a gentle sense of whimsy that the idea of him directing one of Seth Rogen's potty-mouthed, blowhard vehicles doesn't quite compute. Add the studio mandates of a big-budget superhero franchise and you get a scattered and schizophrenic experience. Gondry's fondness for antiquated technologies and visual curlicues don't mesh with writer/star Rogen's swaggering frat-boy bravado. Disparate sensibilities clash all over the place in this notoriously troubled production about a slovenly spoiled heir who takes up costumed crime-fighting on a lark, thanks mostly to his hypercompetent assistant, Kato (Jay Chou). The idea of a jackass masked crusader is a welcome one in this era of solemn superhero epics, but this rather amusing movie feels assembled at odd angles, with a lot of clever comic conceits that never quite work together. Yet, The Green Hornet is also oddly endearing at the end. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Hall Pass ★ ½ The Farrelly Brothers' decade-long wallow in irrelevance continues with this sad spectacle, which stars Owen Wilson and Jason Sudeikis as a couple of dorky suburbanites granted a week's vacation from the vows of marriage by their exasperated better halves. The problem that has plagued every Farrelly movie since their twin triumphs—Kingpin and There's Something About Mary—is that the copious gross-outs feel obligatory. The brothers have been self-consciously trying to outdo the hair-gel joke since 1998, getting bigger and ruder while simultaneously neglecting the construction that made those set-pieces the stuff of legend. Shot like a sitcom, with unconvincing

Georgia locations standing in for Rhode Island and the Cape, this garishly overlit film lacks any semblance of real human behavior. Outlandish flights of profanity reek of flopsweat, as if the brothers know they've been eclipsed by Judd Apatow but assume that by throwing enough pee-pee and poo-poo at the screen they might catch up. What use is spraying diarrhea all over a wall if you don't follow it up with a punch line? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Just Go With It ★ ½ Every time Adam Sandler bears his soul and takes a beating at the box office, as with Punch-Drunk Love or the more recent Funny People, he follows up with another five years of blockbuster slop from his Happy Madison crap factory, which grinds out indifferently acted, lowest-common-denominator comedies at a depressingly prolific pace. This latest affront stars Sandler as a caddish plastic surgeon who, for reasons too laborious to explain, forces his long-suffering assistant (Jennifer Aniston) to pretend to be his ex-wife during a trip to Hawaii with a bodacious babe (model Brookyn Decker). Undisciplined and punishingly overlong, the movie oozes misogyny, homophobia and an overall aura of lazy contempt. The lone bright spots are Aniston's barbed line readings, probably because she seems as annoyed by the plot and abrasive characters as we are. I daresay she's never been so human and relatable onscreen. Too bad the movie only decides she's worthwhile as a person after she puts on a bikini. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

No Strings Attached ★★ Natalie Portman and charisma vacuum Ashton Kutcher star in this raunchy romantic comedy that wonders if two friends can sleep together without falling in love. An interesting question, but not one that applies to Elizabeth Meriwether's screenplay, as these two crazy kids are obviously in love from the very first frames, and there's absolutely nothing keeping them apart except the annoying demands of the movie's premise. A shame, as director Ivan Reitman has assembled a killer supporting cast to steal every scene that isn't nailed down. Greenberg's Greta Gerwig and local Office gal Mindy Kaling deserve a movie of their own as Portman's sassy roommates. Kevin Kline is hysterical as Kutcher's lothario father, a vain TV star with a fondness for younger women and Lil' Wayne. Even the tiniest parts are fleshed out by pros like Olivia Thirlby, Abby Elliott and

Ludacris. Alas, these stars swirl around the black hole that is Kutcher and Portman, tediously stalling for time before the movie finally arrives at its foregone conclusion. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Rite ★ "What did you expect," Anthony Hopkins' grumbling, workaday exorcist asks: "Spinning heads? Pea soup?" No. That would have been entertaining. Instead, director Mikael Håfström's contribution to the curiously resilient demonic-possession genre gives us plodding, docudrama earnestness. Purporting to be "inspired by true events," The Rite wants to have its cake and eat it too, pretending to take questions of faith seriously—until it's time for the money shots and CGI effects to kick in. Dishwater-dull Colin O'Donoghue stars as a skeptical seminary student aiming to swindle the Catholic Church out of a free college education, but an inadvertently hilarious combination of accidents send him to Rome, studying under Hopkins' scenery-chewing cleric. This was done better in 1973, and if you've seen one young girl writhing around in restraints, hissing obscenities in foreign tongues, you've seen them all. Meanwhile, the PG-13 rating ensures that her invective is limited to the likes of: "Your mother darns socks in heck." No crucifixes were harmed in the making of this picture. (In the suburbs.)

Sanctum ★ ½ Even though we're all pretty much sick of the gimmick already, James Cameron still believes in 3D. As producer of this thoroughly unremarkable and sometimes laughably acted adventure flick, Cameron has given his blessing and loaned his Avatar cameras to an Australian production that otherwise feels like one of those cheap movies you'd find on the SyFy channel at some unfortunate hour of the morning. Dewy, over-emotive Rhys Wakefield stars as the rebellious son of Richard Roxburgh's cranky Cousteau-ish explorer. When a cave dive goes awry, the two are forced into family bonding in claustrophobic, flooding crawl spaces. Directed by Alister Grierson, Sanctum boasts all its producer's weaknesses and none of his strengths. Characters spew goofy gobs of exposition and constantly inform the audience that they're seeing something spectacular. (In actuality, it doesn't look so hot.) The banality of the father-son drama is more suffocating than the cramped quarters, and Ioan Gruffudd's performance as a Richard Branson wannabe boasts some of the most amateurish line-readings this side of community theater. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (In the suburbs.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her Pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured, absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Unknown ★★★ Apparently Liam Neeson, the husky-voiced oak tree of an actor creeping up on his 60th birthday, has decided to become the next Jason Statham, knocking around a bunch of Eurotrash baddies in some slickly engineered B-pictures. This is not an unwelcome development. Like Neeson's surprise 2008 smash Taken, Unknown is shrewdly crafted Friday-night entertainment—the kind of movie that'll play forever on cable. As a botanist who suffers temporary amnesia after a car accident in Berlin,

Neeson finds another man (amusingly played by his Michael Collins frenemy Aidan Quinn) stealing his identity. Conspiracies and righteous pummelings abound, as do the cardboard line readings of Mad Men's January Jones. A goofy timekiller well aware of its silliness, the film boasts fine wide-screen location work and deliciously hammy turns from Bruno Ganz and Frank Langella. The movie knows exactly what it's doing, and does it well. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Sounds and the City

Back to the Future In the age of realistic special effects and 3D cameras, the allure of silent films might seem obscure. But Metropolis was the Avatar of its day, with grandiose sets and a chilling peek into a dystopian future. The Somerville Theatre's screening on March 5 includes a live performance by the Alloy Orchestra, adding an original score to the film. Now if we could just figure out how to subtract the smugness from Avatar... Casey Prusher

PARTING SHOTS

The Pogues wind down their raucous relationship.

The Pogues
play the House of Blues March 11-12.

Bleddyn Butcher

THE CHANCES ONCE seemed slim that Celtic-punk pioneers the Pogues would endure for a quarter century—or that singer Shane MacGowan would survive at all. The ragged frontman, whose drink- and drug-fueled instability has distracted from his gift for literary verse, was even booted from the group in 1991.

Yet the London-based band reformed with MacGowan this past decade and have graced Boston with semiannual concerts around St. Patrick's Day since 2006. Similar to local favorites the Dropkick Murphys, the Pogues have become a March institution, thriving in spite of MacGowan's sometimes shaky state.

But things may come to a head. "It has become harder and harder sorta dragging Shane around as he's gotten older," says cofounder Spider Stacy, 52. "Everybody [in the group] is that much older, and everybody gets that much more tired that much more quickly, and it's particularly noticeable with Shane."

So the band has followed a "Farewell Christmas Tour" of the U.K. with a six-city U.S. swing that rolls through Boston's House of Blues on March 11–12, billed as "A Parting Glass With... the Pogues."

"If it is—or you suspect that it is—the last time you might be doing something, it's only fair to let people know," Stacy says from his London home, noting the band plans to remain on the European festival circuit. "With regard to the States, it almost certainly is the last time we'll be doing it like this."

Now in their 50s, most members of the group have embraced either sobriety or "a more considered approach to the way you live your life," Stacy says, but MacGowan's not among them. "That does kinda have an effect, and not necessarily a positive one."

For one thing, he says, the Pogues haven't been up to recording new material, particularly at a level to match the peak they reached in the '80s. "I don't see us recapturing that," Stacy says. "I don't see how anybody could reasonably expect us to."

> "It's a fallacy that you need alcohol to achieve that reckless abandon."

Yet Stacy counters that onstage, the Pogues are "actually better than we ever were," and the group's albums never equaled their live sound. "One of the most surprising things for me since we had the first reunion back in 2001 was the sheer force of the band," he says. "That wasn't in any way diminished. The fact that some of us weren't crazy anymore certainly didn't do us any harm."

So does the more seasoned delivery of today's Pogues stand up to the intensity of the band's early years? "It's a fallacy that you need alcohol or anything to achieve that reckless abandon," Stacy says. "You've just got to play the music the way it's meant to be played. It's meant to be attacked, really."

The Pogues' largely acoustic attack veers from the traditional way of playing the tin whistle, accordion and mandolin, even on standards like "The Wild Rover." "There were [factions] in the Irish folk scene that thought we were pretty much heretics, but there were other people of equal or greater standing who thought we were more in the nature of liberators," Stacy says. He cites second-generation Irish kids who grew up "not really liking some of the songs we were playing because it was their parents' or grandparents' music, and they heard us doing it funneled through this different sensibility."

The band again defied tradition with original songs like "The Sick Bed of Cuchulainn," in which MacGowan snarled, "When you pissed yourself in Frankfurt and got syph down in Cologne, and you heard the rattling death trains as you lay there all alone." Such a volatile mix of punk and Irish music was novel in the early '80s. "I was surprised that nobody thought of it first," Stacy says.

Stacy says he considers Flogging Molly derivative of the Pogues, but he champions the Dropkick Murphys, who play the House of Blues on March 16–18. He and MacGowan each collaborated with the group, which Stacy views as a more straight-ahead punk outfit. He also claims a long-running disagreement with Dropkicks founder Ken Casey on the issue of influence. "I think the Dropkicks would've existed without the Pogues," Stacy states. "He says absolutely not."

MacGowan and Stacy were both punk devotees before turning to Irish influences, having met at a Ramones concert. "I went outside for a breath of fresh air," Stacy recalls. "He was out there and said, 'Are you enjoying yourself?' I said, 'Yeah,' and he said, 'That's what it's all about, idn't it?'" ×××

Sax Sells

Saxophonist Donny McCaslin has been experimenting with genres and styles since Madonna had a last name and parachute pants were cool. Three decades, eight albums and one Grammy nomination later, McCaslin hasn't stopped pushing limits with his brand of modern, funky jazz. His latest record, Perpetual Motion, showcases his full range, nimbly navigating from classic, soulful ballads to revved-up bebop melodies. The eclectic blend establishes his place among those rare artists who find fans across generations. Check out his sax appeal on March 9 at Scullers Jazz Club.

Up in the Air

Purposeful Pointlessness You may think that pushing a block of ice through Mexico City just leaves you with a puddle. But Francis Alÿs highlights the meaning behind seemingly mundane moments in the lives of Mexican ambulantes, or street vendors. Seen through June 5 at Wellesley College's Davis Museum, the Belgian artist employs a range of media—including paintings, photographs, video and drawings—to examine street life in his adopted country. In images like that of a man toting a giant collection of balloons, Francis Alÿs: The Moment Where Sculpture Happens aims to find the extraordinary in the everyday. Hilary White

BOSTON'S BELOVED

Bartenders

What makes a great bartender?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartenders issue.

PUTTING ON THE HEAT

The Kids Are Alright

The weather outside was frightful, but the crowd was quite delightful; in fact, pretty much all the town's pretty people turned out at the Liberty Hotel for the Winter Warm Up party to benefit Youth Design.

A program that provides high school students with paid internships in the design field, the charity was founded by Denise Korn, who clearly has a lot of admiring friends and colleagues, as they braved Snowmageddon to be there. Among them: cohosts Erica Corsano and Ricardo Rodriguez, the rarely glimpsed Rich Levitan with his whirling dervish of a wife, Anna, red-hot redhead Amy D'Ablemont Burns, silver fox Marty Jones, design avatar Matthew Bacon, Karmaloop cuties Jackie Munoz and Sara Garcia, the tall, dark and handsome Daren Bascome, Lev "Freshy-Fresh" Glazman, style icon and It-Girl Liana Peterson Krupp, Back Bay yummy mummy Maura Connolly, latter-day conquistador Javier Cortes, real estate mack daddy Rob Caro, and so on and so forth, ad infinitum.

The evening began with a cocktail reception, and some welcoming remarks that made cocktails all the more welcome, and continued with a dance party that attracted a young, sexy, artsy crowd—think of the cast of an MTV reality show minus all the neuroses and drug problems. The room, meanwhile, was decorated with orange banners and big orange Y's, which some board members stuck to their chests.

"You look like you're wearing a Yale sweatshirt," said one guest, "except that it's Princeton's colors."

In other sartorial news, kabuki socialite Marilyn Riseman (who wasn't there) seems to be passing the fashion baton to her granddaughter, Joanna Prager (who was), while another guest asked, "Does this look better buttoned or unbuttoned?" to which a friend replied, Mae West–style, "I don't know. I'll tell you later."

However, the evening's funniest exchange took place when a guest said, "Now you have me all confused," to which another responded, "I have that effect on people. I confuse myself most of the time."

Poor Camel...

Celebrity sex tapes are a dime a dozen. 501 C-3 sex tapes? Not so much. That was only one of the things that made the Planned Parenthood fund-raiser at the Mandarin Oriental, Boston interesting.

Jackie Munoz at Winter Warm Up

Matthew Bacon at Winter Warm Up

Daren Bascome at Winter Warm Up

Joanna Prager at Winter Warm Up

Cecile Richards and Brit d'Arbeloff at Planned Parenthood

Ellen Payzant, Cecile Richards and Tom Payzant at Planned Parenthood

Another was the guest list, which included national head honcha Cecile Richards (the bane of many Capitol Hill existences), honoree Ilene Greenberg, the hale and hearty George Denny and his activist wife, Leigh Weatherly, arctic blonde beauty Jen Hawkins and her other half, Tom, education czar Tom Payzant and his other half, Ellen, the formidable Brit d'Arbeloff, Room to Grow chief Saskia Epstein and her husband, Paul, political activist and supermarket heiress Deb Goldberg, eminent architect Clement van Buren and Cantabridgian do-gooder Jill Bresky, philanthropic party pair Sherif and Mary Nada, the honorable judge Nonnie Burns, Brookline eminences Coco and Kyra Montagu, bright young things Alison and Zander Packard, the tweely named Tee Taggart and Jack Turner, a whole lot of pro-choice Republicans (judging by the applause generated by Richards' shout-out to their support) and one woman who said, "I just got back from Palm Beach, and every single woman there had had so much plastic surgery they all looked like they were in shock."

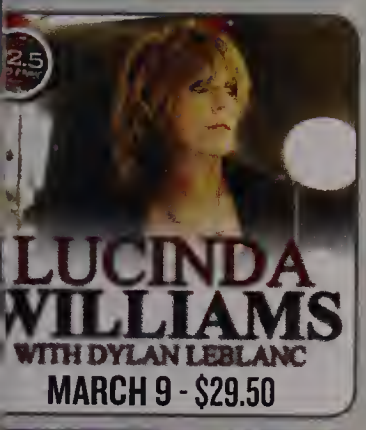
As for the sex tapes, these, of course, refer to the video showing a Planned Parenthood employee behaving badly, which has become a YouTube sensation. (According to Richards, it was an anomaly, and the offender was fired.) Also, demonstrating how divisive the issue is, a security detail wearing glaringly obvious ear-pieces was stationed outside the ballroom.

Not that it wasn't a celebratory affair, full of witty repartee, like the person who looked at the smoked salmon on the plate and said, "Bad breath! See? Even the meal is a prophylactic!"

It was also highly edifying to learn that the very first I.U.D. was invented by some ancient wag who figured out that stuffing a camel's uterus with a date would prevent pregnancy.

Something I'm sure to bring up at my next dinner party.

Ding, Ding, Ding!



We have a winner: Bootylicious fashion plate Laura Baldini won our last contest, correctly guessing that the dress worn at the opening of the new MFA wing was from the final collection of Alexander McQueen. Girl knows her haute couture. ✖✖✖

The IMPROPER

Nirvana on a Barstool

On nights when I’m awakened by my own horrified screams, I like to think about a happy place. Years ago, this was invariably Irene’s Pub, a bare boards saloon decked with a Newfoundland flag and a haze of complacent alcoholism. The patrons took too much pride in their facial hair and not enough in hitting the urinal, but there was something motherly about the way the bartender would build just the right amount of head on your breakfast. In moments of nostalgia, I can conjure an aroma of ashtray, Guinness and fried egg, and I feel like a boy again.

Since then, time has given me a violent drubbing and my happy place has relocated. Sometimes it’s at the bar at Mistral, my martini brimming with jeweled promise as a plate of tuna tartare quietly drips its nectar. Or the bar at Haru, with a martini and a dish of salmon. Or the one at Noche, or Legal Sea Foods or at any other place that sells cold gin and raw fish. My appetites, it turns out, are exactly those of a drunken otter.

The point is that I no longer have to retreat to some fetishized childhood pub. Through long contemplation of appetizer menus, every bar in the city can now be my happy place, a fleece blanket in a universe of razor-sharp, poisonous crap. That’s why I say to hell with the Buddha’s Bodhi tree. In this issue, Kyle Wright finds enlightenment in the contents of a fryolator, while Lindsey Canant expands her consciousness of the tequila craze.

"THE ARCHITECTURE is a nightmare," says Greg Keane, co-owner of Deathwish Piano Movers. From the elfin structural details of Beacon Hill ("Elevators that are little more than birdcages") to the vicious buildings of the North End ("Every mover has lost skin on those stucco walls"), Keane and his team are battle-tested in the nation's worst city for moving. Starting on March 16, the Travel Channel documents their adventures with Deathwish Movers, which finds them hauling everything from gargantuan ice sculptures to a Great Dane with a busted leg. Just another day at the office for these industry specialists. "A lot of our clients are actually moving companies," Keane says. "When they run into problems, they call us."

When dining at Brookline Family Restaurant, you're bound to fill up on bread. If you're not using the shiny, seeded, house-made loaf to mop up the lemony kidney-bean salad, you're grasping the two swaths on either side of a döner kebab sandwich. The soft, focaccia-like crumb holds up remarkably well after soaking up the juices from slabs of spiced, densely packed lamb, rough-cut tomato-cucumber salad and tangy yogurt dressing.

Ernest Dialogue

IN NEED OF REPAIR

John Collins is the founder and artistic director of Elevator Repair Service, the New York–based theater company behind last year's Gatz at the A.R.T. Collins returns to Boston to premiere The Select (The Sun Also Rises), a staged reading of Ernest Hemingway's novel, at ArtsEmerson's Paramount Center through March 20.

You translated Fitzgerald [Gatz] and Faulkner [The Sound and the Fury] for the stage. Why Hemingway?
We asked ourselves: If we want to make a trilogy, who should be the author? The Great Gatsby and The Sound and the Fury are very different, but if there were qualities and themes that link them together, I think those points lead to Hemingway. I like American modernist writing.

Why* The Sun Also Rises?
We were so taken with the dialogue. It was a tone and language that sounded familiar and could feel contemporary.

Did the process differ from past productions?
We'd previously tried to bring the text to the stage verbatim. But that wasn't an option here. We had to build a play out of it.

The Select (The Sun Also Rises) was workshopped at ArtsEmerson and now you're returning to show off the final result. What keeps you coming back to Boston?
The Paramount Center is a big theater for us. Presenters feel like they can put us in bigger spaces, and the workshop gave us the chance to really fine-tune it. It was a privilege that no one else gets.

What's next?
We want to throw all this out the window and try something completely different! I'm thinking something with a contemporary writer. KYLE WRIGHT

Bebop on a Roll

The folks at Thelonious Monkfish know jazz and sushi aren't exactly a Getz/Gilberto combination, but that's part of the fun. This month-old Central Square spot, instantly of note for its ludicrous moniker, focuses on Asian-fusion cuisine delivered with a playful twist. "I didn't want to make a restaurant that was strict," says owner Jamme Chantler. "We like breathing room." While there's plenty of space for adventure on the menu, the actual restaurant is unassuming and modest, with a single row of tables, a sushi bar and a raised, Japanese-style seating area.

THELONIOUS MONKFISH
524 Mass. Ave., Cambridge
(617-441-2116)
thelonious monkfish.com.

Chantler got his start in Asian cuisine owning restaurants like Pepper Sky's (just a block away on Pearl Street) and Tuk Tuk in Tewksbury. There, the focus is on Thai dishes. "There's certainly an influence of Thai food behind many of the items on the menu," he says. "But we saw a need for sushi in Central Square, so we decided to marry cuisines together." Chef/co-owner Chupada Phomjun's standard takes on pad thai appear on the menu, alongside more unusual fare like Mad Monk noodles ($11.95), a garlicky mound of soba, shiitake mushrooms and red peppers covered in a hoisin-peanut sauce.

The sushi menu borrows plenty of names from jazz and pop culture vernacular, including the chili-sauced Mack the Knife maki ($6.50) or Regattabar roll ($6.50), with salmon, cucumber, avocado, lettuce, tobiko and mayo. "Sometimes we come up with the names first," Chantler adds. "It's all in good fun."

Jazz music fills the space, although the long-term goal is to host live music on the reclaimed-wood platform in the corner. "The Thai king is quite a jazz musician, you know," says Chantler, referring to King Bhumibol Adulyadej. His Royal Highness played with Jack Teagarden, Benny Goodman and others before assuming the throne, so maybe the name isn't as far of a stretch as most would think. No word on how he feels about sushi, though.

STEPPED IN IT

TO THE BLUE-EYED JOGGER WHO STOPPED TO YELL AT ALL THE DOG OWNERS ON THE ESPLANADE: You used very foul language in telling us to leash our dogs. When I pointed out that you liked to run and dogs should be afforded the same luxury, I must've hit a nerve. You couldn't stop spewing. When I explained that I'm a responsible dog owner who picks up after my dog (who happened to be leashed), you replied, "If I find any shit, I'll come back and smash it in your face!" You yelled at everyone, even the dog-walker with nine dogs! Sir, I'd rather deal with the poo on the ground than with all the crap flying out of your mouth. I'm glad that the dog owners outnumbered you that day, and I hope you know that we'll continue to enjoy a nice walk in the fresh air with our dogs.

For the love of dogs

To the not-so-subtle Orange Line ogler:

I'm not sure if you find me attractive, or if I have something hanging from my nose, but your staring is not only obvious—it's highly disconcerting. Next time, use the reflection in the window for your lengthy looks, or at least have the courtesy to shift your eyes to and fro a bit so that creepy tingling feeling in the back of my neck will ease up for a minute or two.

Weirded out

To the sympathetic Starbucks barista:

Thank you for being the only person bold enough to point out the giant glob of yogurt on my face, and thank you for discreetly whispering, "Is that, uh… paint on your chin?" instead of shrieking in disgust at my lack of basic hygiene skills. Next time I'm shoveling food in my face in a frazzled state, I'll be sure to bring a napkin.

EASY PICKINGS

Even on a shoestring, buying top-quality wine is a cinch. True, there's huge quality variation in the popularly priced $12 to $20 range, but that's why blind tastings were invented: to uncover the gems.

The following are standouts. Perhaps they won't provide a full religious experience, but they're easy-drinking winners on which you can stock up without breaking your budget.

Ken Forester "Petit Chenin" Chenin Blanc STELLENBOSCH, SOUTH AFRICA, 2009 ($9, THE WINE CASK, SOMERVILLE). Chenin blanc is the underdog white grape you root for because it's so good, so versatile and yet so underappreciated. This modestly priced beauty is bone dry, soft and mellow, with pear and honey aromas and a gentle, slightly spicy finish. It's not complex, just kick-back delicious, and it'll complement everything from salads to roast chicken to fish.

Paul Janin, Domaine des Vignes des Jumeaux BEAUJOLAIS-VILLAGES, FRANCE, 2009 ($17, BRIX WINE SHOP, BOSTON). The year 2009 is something special in Beaujolais, and certainly the greatest vintage I've ever experienced. This estate wine has a fragrance of super-ripe boysenberries; its flavors burst on the palate, a lush, intense mouthful of red fruit and rich, mouth-coating spices. The quintessential red wine to pair with fish, it can be enjoyed a bit on the cool side, and is also great for quaffing without any food at all.

Fumanelli Valpolicella Classico VENETO, ITALY, 2009 ($15, BAUER WINE, BOSTON). Valpolicella is one of those regional Italian wines that's been around forever, but, because of big brand mediocrity, can be easy to overlook. Some of the passionate smaller estates like Fumanelli are creating magic with the obscure corvina, rondinella and molinara grapes that this area of northeastern Italy has produced from time immemorial. This one has a creamy texture to go along with raisiny, almond-like, chocolate aromas. Its jammy plum fruit, low tannins and intense ripeness are plain irresistible, balancing just about any casual dish.

Bramosia Chianti Classico TUSCANY, ITALY, 2007 ($14, CHARLES STREET LIQUORS, BOSTON). As a category with an enormous range in quality, it's not surprising that Chianti confuses people. This wine is from the most prestigious centrally located production zone. Bramosia features a profusion of ripe, tangy cherry fruit with smoky undertones and a smooth, lingering finish. It offers great balance and is ideal with pasta.

MASTER OF WINE SANDY BLOCK IS VICE PRESIDENT OF BEVERAGE OPERATIONS FOR LEGAL SEA FOODS.

BATTERY RECHARGE

And the W dabbles with Spice.

CHEF DAVID DANIELS' return to Boston after five years at Topper's at the Wauwinet in Nantucket is a homecoming. "I'm rooted again," he explains. "Most of my family lives in East Boston."

Much of his culinary reputation was earned here, too—at Ambrosia on Huntington and the Federalist. Now, for the first time, he's charged with opening a restaurant, Aragosta, in the Fairmont Battery Wharf, and he's psyched. "The concept—Mediterranean with slight French accents—is really dear to my heart," he says, adding, "Execution is paramount; ingredients aren't rocket science." As an example, he cites his take on lobster ravioli with a "simple" cauliflower puree, fennel pollen and spring pea shoots.

Daniels expects to open Aragosta mere weeks after the closing of Sensing in April. "We've just enough time to pull it off," he says, noting that he's keeping the Sensing staff and only making minor changes to the decor.

Daniels is also attuned to the economy. "We certainly won't be an expensive restaurant," he says. "We wouldn't want to scare anybody away."

Sensing earned consistently glowing reviews but somehow never caught on with local diners. "I wouldn't say it failed," says Matthew Sterne, the Fairmont Battery Wharf's general manager. "I think some of the food is some of the best I've ever eaten." Nonetheless, Sterne is looking forward to Aragosta's opening. He's especially fond of the name (lobster in Italian), given that the site was once the home of Bay State Lobster.

POP-UP RESTAURANT meets trial balloon: In April 18, Market in the W Hotel will morph into Spice Market and showcase the street food of Southeast Asia. Jean-Georges Vongerichten, whose Spice Markets in New York City and Qatar are hugely successful, aims to test the waters in anticipation of opening a branch in Boston within the next year.

Truffle Shuffle

Truffle fanatics will dig the opening of Sabatino & Co. on March 24. The country's largest importer of truffle products, Sabatino & Co. began as a family-run business in a small Italian village. A century later, Newbury Street gourmands can sample everything from strawberry-infused Israeli honey to soap made from Sicilian lava rock. But CEO Gabriel Balestra won't let the store get too haughty, as shoppers can browse products and images from the original Sabatino shop. Says Belestra of the business his great-grandfather began, "Our philosophy has always been to provide a direct line from manufacturer to kitchen table."

Drink of the Moment

Sherry on Top

While looking for ways to mix wine with other non-spirits, Toro beverage manager Courtney Bissonnette drew upon what she calls her "dear love," sherry. With its sherry count in the double digits and cocktails like the rebujito and SHERRY JULEP → (both $8) on the menu, Toro has mastered this specialty niche.

Every year, Toro staffers undergo a month-long sherry training to help them overcome misconceptions about the Spanish wine. "Sherry is sadly misunderstood," Bissonnette explains. "In America, people think of it as something that their grandmother kept or that British people drink before bed."

But she's noticed it become popular with a younger, spirit-savvy crowd. Used playfully, often in the place of vermouth, sherry's profile is on the rise. You could say it's the newest old thing to take the cocktail world by storm.

The sherry julep's pale cream sherry combines with a dash of cava to bring the cheerful familiarity of cream soda to the palate, while the latter's sparkle adds mild notes of citrus to the bouquet. The off-dry muscatel-based sherry is smooth, sweet and lightly floral. Muddled mint rounds out the flavors with a fresh herbal touch.

Nearing the glass' bottom, the mint becomes both bolder and brighter—just like sherry's image. "It takes a while to grasp," Bissonnette says. But once you start exploring, you'll sip like an old-timer on this revived tipple.

MYSTERY MAN

How well can you know your spouse?

GOLDEN IN MANY WAYS, the marriage between suave Upton Brady, director of the Atlantic Monthly Press, and his writer wife, Sally, produced four children. They met at the Boston Cotillion and lived, despite some bumpy parental resistance, a life of literary merriment. Over the years, social martinis turned into unhappy ones for Upton, leading to scary outbursts. Sally Brady flits back and forth across their 46 years together, keeping alive both the sweet elements of their relationship and the dark ones. Specifically, Upton's confession of at least one gay encounter. "Fear has an insidious way of blossoming, once you let it in."

A Box of Darkness: The Story of a Marriage
Sally Ryder Brady

Brady lives in Vermont.

After her husband's death, Sally finds gay magazines and videos. She wonders about Upton's hidden, clearly guilt-ridden "other self," and what she had truly meant to him. In his 20 plus years of therapy, he'd made no mention of his secret. Their longtime marriage clearly contained richness and depth, with Upton's Catholicism sitting alongside a moral dilemma about his brother's gayness and his own ambiguous sexuality. It all made, so to speak, strange bedfellows. But he hoped she'd cherish the Everly Brothers lyric he played for her: "Without your sweet love, what would life be?" ×××

FROM PAGE 119: "After dinner and another whiskey, this time with more water, Upton would put some music on the stereo—Mozart or Haydn—take out the Scrabble or backgammon board, and we would play through a haze of cigarette smoke. He loved games. Games had rules; everything was black or white, no gray areas. Conversations, on the other hand, with anyone and especially with me, could be treacherous. They might lead to discussions or worse, negotiations. We might find ourselves in emotional quicksand, with no rules, no safety net, no boundaries. Backgammon and Scrabble boards became our battlegrounds. I didn't know why Upton was so frightened of feelings, only that he was."

PUBLIC OPINION

The Fenway continues to collect quality destinations.

Citizen Public House & Oyster Bar

HIP PUREE The brandade makes for an excellent shared appetizer.

THE OWNERS OF THE highly regarded Franklin Cafe triumvirate have invaded the Fenway. Fans of the Old Town Team can now enjoy high-end gastropub cuisine at the popular Citizen Public House. Added to existing eateries of note in the space south of Fenway Park—from Basho Japanese Brasserie to Jerry Remy's—the competition is heating up in an area that used to be dead between October and April. Watch out, Eastern Standard, Island Creek and the other bastions of Kenmore Square: SoFe is coming for you.

My first visit came early one week when I arrived at 7 pm to find the festivities were standing room only. Given the quality of the food and the conviviality, this boîte can get entirely too cramped. Seven booths and two long tables seat about 60 (when the booths aren't piled high with winter coats), with supplementary seating at both a wet and a raw bar. Decor is pubby, with a dark wooden bar, framed mirrors, a chalkboard wall listing an array of whiskeys, and dim lighting, save for the bright sign pointing the way to the "Loo."

I paired a pint of hoppy Harpoon IPA ($5) with two of the menu's "snacks" ($5 each), the brandade and the meatballs. Served in a tiny cast-iron pan, the brandade was a delicious, smoky, peppery puree of cod and potato. The canederli meatballs, two hefty spheres almost three inches in diameter, were tender, moist and flavorful. "Canederli" refers to a traditional preparation from the Dolomites in northern Italy, a way of rescuing old bread by softening it with milk and combining it with fragments of meat.

Standard appetizers included an excellent baby beet salad ($7), sweet, colorful, earthy beets tossed with spiced walnuts, and a quirky pig's trotter schnitzel ($11), breaded pig's feet fried crisp and served with tartar sauce and a dish of warm, crunchy, bacon-studded cabbage slaw. Pass on the bratwurst ($9), with its texture somewhere between mushy and mealy.

Slow-braised beef short ribs ($19) were accompanied by celeriac puree, shallot demi-glace and Brussels sprouts, their pleasantly bitter notes standing up to the robust flavor of the meat. A subtler and more sedate special one evening was short loin of veal ($21), roasted on the bone and garnished with green beans. The "Carpetbagger" filet mignon ($22) arrived on a bed of buttery spinach, topped with a dollop of oyster butter and a red-wine reduction alongside. Finally, a roasted half chicken ($18), cooked to a crisp ideal, came with little roast potatoes in a luscious reduction redolent of bacon and shallots and finished with cider.

For dessert, a picture-perfect crème caramel ($8) tasted even better than it looked, its velvet, creamy texture and vanilla-spiked taste making it the perfect ending to a meal. For beverages, besides the inviting selection of draft and bottled beers and impressive selection of whiskeys, Citizen's wine offerings proved more than credible. We enjoyed a bottle of 2008 Chappellet ($36), a well-structured Napa Valley cabernet boasting good acidity and depth. Despite how busy Citizen became during two of my three visits, service was first-rate, and I came away with only one disappointment: I was unable to assemble the minimum of 10 gourmands necessary to order the restaurant's whole pig roast, an experience I've been assured is worth the effort and expense ($380). Yet another meal to add to my culinary bucket list. ×××

FUN-RAISING

The Friends of the Boston Park Ranger Mounted Unit held its "Children's Tea and Fashion Show" at the Four Seasons Hotel Boston on Feb. 13. The party brought 150 parents and children together for an afternoon of cookie decorating and a Pollywogs of Needham fashion show. The event raised more than $10,000 to support Boston's mounted park ranger service.

The Boston Bruins Foundation's first "Boston Bruins Casino Night" took place at the Westin Copley Place on Feb. 20. VIP ticket holders met Bruins players and alumni before taking part in casino games and an auction. Some 400 guests attended to raise more than $75,000.

WHERE IT'S @

I'm developing a cult following.

LATELY I'VE SEEN A FEW stories about how dominant new tech companies don't actually employ many people. One oft-cited stat claims that Twitter has 350 employees. Personally, I find that hard to believe. If you've ever used Twitter, you know that number seems high by about 345.

Yes, I'm now acquainted with the vagaries of Twitter, for I have joined the tweeters. I know that I made fun of Twitter and said that it dumbs down our national discourse, but what's that expression about a foolish consistency? A foolish consistency is a hobgoblin.... A foolish consistency is a hobbled goblin on your mind? No—if you're foolish, a hobbit will gobble your mind. That's it, I'm pretty sure. Anyway, does Twitter make people dumber? I dunno.

So I'm on Twitter. I couldn't resist. Legions of fans were constantly begging me to start tweeting. By which I mean one person casually mentioned that I should try it. OK, people, I give in! Everyone stop with the petitions and whatnot that I imagine you were probably planning. Everyone in Libya, you can settle down now. I'll tweet for you, my loyal followers.

Even someone new to Twitter can immediately spot some things that need fixing. For one, there's that word "follower." Once upon a time, you had to be a cult leader to have followers. Now just anyone can do it. Well, I think that "follower" is a weird, overwrought word to apply to people who read your tweets, and I refuse to use the term. I vow that if you choose to read my feed, I won't call you a "follower." I'll call you a "minion." Here's a tweet: Do my bidding! #iamacultleader.

Those of you who still don't tweet will wonder why I used a # sign right there. Well, I'm not entirely sure myself. You see, Twitter has its own silly language. You can design a whole website without knowing HTML, but Twitter requires you to learn all its little codes to make sense of what you're reading. Sometimes Twitter makes me feel like a farm boy who wants to learn how to talk to an Italian supermodel. It's possible that I've seen too many ads for Rosetta Stone at the airport.

The urge to check Twitter is the same psychological imperative that drives people to play slot machines. The occasional reward stimulates your brain in such a way that you come back for more. Most of Twitter is a desolate crap-tundra of banality, but then you read Rob Delaney's observation that humans are superior to lions because we have butt cheeks, and it's all worth it.

However, like I said, there are some kinks to work out. For example, it seems like a minority of tweets are actually original information. A lot of them are people's responses to something that someone wrote as a message. When you publically reply to a tweet, it's like cc'ing the entire world on an e-mail, except that you only get to see one side of the conversation. Daniel Tosh, for instance, is hilarious, but his Twitter feed is awful because he live-chats with fans. Here's a sample of his Twitter feed: "One of these days you will." And "I have better things to do." Hey, me too!

> If you choose to read my tweets, I won't call you a "follower." I'll call you a "minion." Here's a tweet: Do my bidding!

Thus I generally haven't responded to people's messages because I want to avoid Tosh-like corruption of my pristine Twitter feed. That policy may be impolite, but I'm still working on my Twitter etiquette. My friend Katie has been on Twitter for a couple years, so I asked her if it's rude not to reciprocate on following—it seems that if someone follows you and you don't respond by following them, you're essentially proclaiming that you're awesome and they're not. "I've gotten yelled at for not following people," Katie tells me. "One guy sent me an e-mail because he was mad that I wasn't following him, but he was following me." Personally, if I follow someone and they don't follow me within 24 hours, I'm going to take it very personally. Yeah, I'm talking to you, Steve Martin. You only follow 34 people, and they're all nobodies like "Bill Cosby" and "Jim Carrey."

Twitter is fun and all, but I've found that 140 characters is actually too many. Who has that kind of energy? So I'm soliciting venture capital for a new social networking product that'll only allows 100-character haikus. It's called HiKu, but nobody has the patience to say that, so the shorthand is just "Hhhhhh." I can't reveal our entire business plan, but the "%" sign figures heavily on "Hhhhhh." If you want in on the ground floor, I'm tweeting about it right now, my minions. ×××

RINK RATS

In this town, hockey is a way of life.

ALMOST EVERYONE I know who grew up around Boston skated on ponds. Hockey was, and is, a sport we're still crazy about. I first skated (or fell) at Bullough's Pond in Newton opposite City Hall—I hated the skating, but loved the hot chocolate in the warming house. Later, in Brookline, my friends and I walked or hitchhiked to the big pond in back of what's now the Chestnut Hill Mall, or to Brandegee's Pond on the border of West Roxbury, where there was always the possibility of fights with the tough guys over the border. Or through the woods to the Old Dam at the end of Arlington Road, where Olympic medalist Tenley Albright used to practice while we played pickup hockey with hats, scarves and jackets serving as goal markers. There was never an adult in attendance, and the guys who looked rich brought the puck.

Some of my friends played hockey in college and never got it out of their systems. It's a typical Boston story. And, also typical of Boston, even the rink rats are divided into tribes: the blue bloods and the blue collars.

My friend Harry is a definite blue blood with a lunch-bucket work ethic. (During summers in college, he worked as a roustabout, laying pipe in the Texas oil fields for $2.22 an hour.) When he began to play hockey at 12 or 13, his family was so pleased they donated a rink to his prep school. Over the years, as an old-fashioned professional trustee, he has almost single-handedly saved several philanthropic organizations. The man lives to serve. "But hockey defined so much that has been wonderful in my life," he told me.

He was a goalie in the semifinals of the NCAA Championships against North Dakota. His coach came up to him before the game and said, "These guys don't even attend classes. They all look to be seven feet tall. I fear for your life, Harry." They lost nine to one.

Much later, in his 40s, he played for a team of ex-college skaters in a tournament in Santa Rosa, Calif., sponsored and run by Charles Schulz, creator of Peanuts. "Teams came from all over North America. Schulz was a hockey nut, obsessed with details. One team from Alberta couldn't believe us. 'Who the hell are these guys who wear ties?' they said."

Harry finally gave up the sport when he started having bad dreams about tending goal. "Most guys have nightmares about not being prepared for exams. I thank the stars that I dream about pucks."

My buddy Billy reflected on all this. He told me, "My daughter, Jennifer, says that hockey is so poetic. I say that we humans desire to fly, and there's no other sport that sets you as free as hockey. You feel like you're flying, and it's as addictive as sex. Well, almost as addictive." He continued, "A few mornings a week I go to a college rink at 6 am. I bribe the attendant to let me in. He gives me two bottles of water and a puck. I fly around for an hour or so. Solo. And I float free. Best workout... better than meditation or yoga."

Billy spun yarns about Boston's hockey culture. "If you grew up blue collar, triple-deckers, your dad a cop or working at the electric company, or he split or was in jail, hockey was, and is, your ticket out. Getting your seat at the table."

"You all skated on ponds?"

"There were so few rinks, years ago. Seven in the morning at the old Boston Arena. Eleven at night at the Lynn Arena. We wanted it bad. And everyone who skated knew everyone else, a band of brothers."

Billy skates in several leagues that play from Thanksgiving through March, $550 per man per season, three nights a week. The guys show up, split into teams, red jerseys, white jerseys. Then they go at it. No body checking allowed. Some guys are in their late 60s or early 70s—most were skaters in college, some of them almost professional. "I saw a kid who played at Harvard, an investment banker, take his stick two-handed and whack it against the neck of an opponent. 'How could you do that?' I asked the kid. 'He was in my territory,' the banker said. 'I'm not giving up my territory.' The banker was in his early 40s. A huge fight broke out, with everyone on the ice, gloves off. It's a culture."

Billy calls it "body psychotherapy." "It's almost like the American Indians playing lacrosse, it's in our blood. And the violence? If you think about it, we were the first and only sport where the guys would line up and shake hands afterwards." Billy told me that at one rink, the organizer fixed the Pepsi machine to dispense only beer, and after the late-night games, everyone would get drunk and come home sometime in the early hours.

"A lot of this play is not for fun," he added. "It's deadly serious. The guys have their superstitions, putting down the old rug remnant on the locker room floor; only wearing old uniforms. How you'd 'bump' your stick to curve them, or plane 'em down, or steam them, or tape the blade. Ceremony." He smiled. "I'm never gonna leave the zone. Hockey defines life."

Fred, a famous utilities lawyer, is 75 years old. He's been playing on a team formed in Wellesley in the 1970s. "I wear my lucky skates I first got at Amherst in the 1950s. I still have beers with the boys after games. But you know why I really still play hockey?"

"No, why?"

"Because, for a few hours a week every winter, I can feel young again."

TAKE 5

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON SHAQ, OAKTOWN, TA AND THE MADNESS

OUTSIDE SHOT Lucic aims for 35-plus goals.

5 OVER/UNDERS

Josh Beckett 2011 Starts: 30 I don't want to say Josh Beckett's snakebitten. (What? It's a weird thing to say.) But the guy can't buy a break. We all know how important rhythm is this spring, and how hard that can be to maintain when you've got rogue fly balls dive-bombing your head, yet somehow he needs to stay on track. At this point, I feel like 30 starts is a stretch, but if he can regain his presence, consistency and dominance, the Sox are at the next level.

Shaq Playoff Games: 15 The Celtics have averaged 21.3 playoff games a year since the Big Three came together. But how many times will you see Shaq this postseason? It's such a crapshoot. I wouldn't be surprised by five, and wouldn't be shocked by 21. In the end, I can't believe they make the Kendrick Perkins trade unless there's serious confidence in Shaq's availability. Or a serious referee blackmail scheme planned for the playoffs.

Milan Lucic Total Goals: 35 It's been 18 years since a Bruins left winger scored 30 goals in a season. Which is important for two reasons: 1) It gives me an excuse to mention Joe Juneau (who scored 32 in '93). 2) At press, Milan Lucic had 29 goals. Will he break Juneau's mark? How about 40 goals? Yes, and hell no! I'm saying Looch has one more little burst and barely gets past 35. Not bad after last year's nine-goal gutter ball.

March Madness First Round Upsets: 10 Last year there were 10. Is this year going to be another one of those crazy, bracket-busting, worth-telling-your-boss-you've-contracted-chlamydia-so-you-can-skip-work-and-watch-the-games tournaments? Or will the Madness take a tranquilizer dart to the jugular and just mellow out for a few weeks? There's nothing (except maybe Teen Mom) more depressing than a predictable March, so let's have some faith.

Draft Day Picks: 4.5 The Pats have nine picks in next month's draft, and as you know, nothing, and I mean nothing, tickles Bill Belichick like wheeling and dealing with a batch of picks. He can't resist! I say he keeps five of those nine, so it's barely over. Unfortunately for you, so is this column.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/17: Screw the play-In games, the real March Madness starts today. As does your fake illness.

3/19: The Bruins play Toronto for what feels like the 27th time this season. Whatever, the more the merrier when it comes to Little Phil and the Leafs.

3/20: It's Red Sox vs. Cardinals down at Spring Training. Hey, did you hear that Albert Pujols might leave St. Louis, but probably won't, yet we're going to talk about it nonstop anyway?!

3/23: Tony Allen makes his return to the Garden (with Memphis), and I'm actually excited. I don't even know me anymore.

SEND FEEDBACK TO RICH@IMPROPER.COM AND READ MORE AT CSNNE.COM.

1 ONE CINDERELLA LOCK

Last year, I gave you St. Mary's, and that pick set the biweekly sports column industry on fire. This year, it's Oakland. They're the second-highest scoring team in the country. Senior center Keith Benson is a double-double machine. They're the Golden Grizzlies! Sweet 16. Lock it down.

2 FASHION STATEMENTS

His Name Is Rio By now, you've seen Tom Brady dancing around Brazil with his hair in a ponytail and his body gyrating in a way that's so awkward I'm getting chills just typing about it. And you know what? I don't care. I can't care. It's gone too far. Just wake me when the strike's over.

Los Jerseys I appreciate the NBA wanting to pay homage to its Spanish-speaking fans, but does simply slapping an "El" or a "Los" in front of the name on the uniforms really do the trick? It doesn't even make sense! Although, there's something about Nenad Krstic in a Los Celtics jersey that has me rethinking my stance.

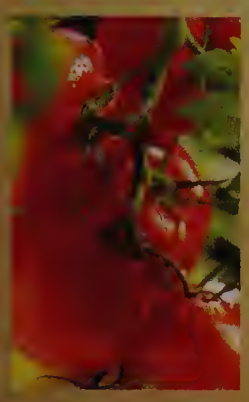
3 Belated Trade Thoughts

Feeling Randy The Perk trade reminds me a lot of the Randy Moss deal, mostly because Perk and Randy have so much in common. No, actually it's because of the public reaction. First, Ainge/Belichick were lunatics. "They killed the season!" Then, they were geniuses. "Oh my God, it makes so much sense!" But in the end, as we learned with the Pats, the playoffs will be the judge.

Smallville One benefit to adding Jeff Green, according to Doc Rivers, is the C's can now "go small" for the first time since 2008. And while that's great, you wonder how effective it'll be against, say, Chicago in the conference finals. Who's Green guarding: Boozer or Noah? Bring on the Ticket Stub.

Dino Radja, Stand Up With Serbians Nenad Krstic and Sasha Pavlovic now with the team, that makes three foreign players who've suited up for the Celtics this year. An impressive number considering that in the previous 10 seasons, Boston employed a total of five. Tough crowd, too: Michael Olowokandi, Bruno Sundov, Jiri Welsch, Vitaly Potapenko and Rueben Wolkowyski. (I have no idea who Ruben is, either.)

Why We're Devoting This Whole Ad To The Subject Of Veggies.



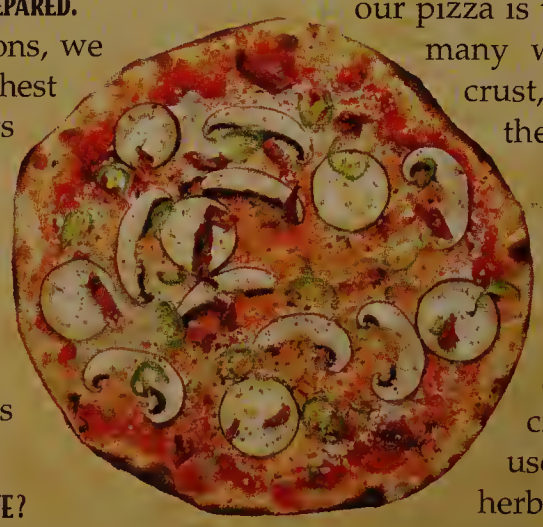
(and why most of our rivals remain mum on the subject.)

It may seem a bit odd for a pizza place to get all worked up about veggies but, as anyone who knows us will attest, we're no ordinary pizza place. We like to think we're more of a gourmet restaurant who happens to specialize in pizzas. Overstatement? Read on about how finicky we are with our variety of veggies and judge for yourself.

Never frozen or canned, our spinach is always fresh, ways hand cut.

Whether spread on top or blended for our sauce, we use only fresh, prime tomatoes.

Want to try something delicious? We'll oven roast your veggies first.



Believe it or not, you can choose from some 30 tasty veggie toppings when you order a pizza with us. (OK, technically, a few aren't vegetables, but you get the point.)

If you're a produce person, you'll love the pizzas we produce.

Fresh, select, hand-prepared.

With just a few exceptions, we always use the finest, freshest veggies we can get our mitts on. Most pizza places offer far fewer choices, and less choice versions. Typically, frozen this or canned that.

It's more costly and more work, but the difference in color, texture and flavor is noticeable with each bite.

Roasted squash, anyone?

Besides offering a vast variety of fresh veggies, we also offer a delicious option that's become very popular: Roasted veggies.

We slice them up, arrange them on a flat pan with olive oil and a little basil & oregano, salt & pepper, then roast them briefly in our pizza oven.

Red pepper, potato, zucchini, squash, eggplant—you name it.

Veggielicious!.

A word or three on our sauce.

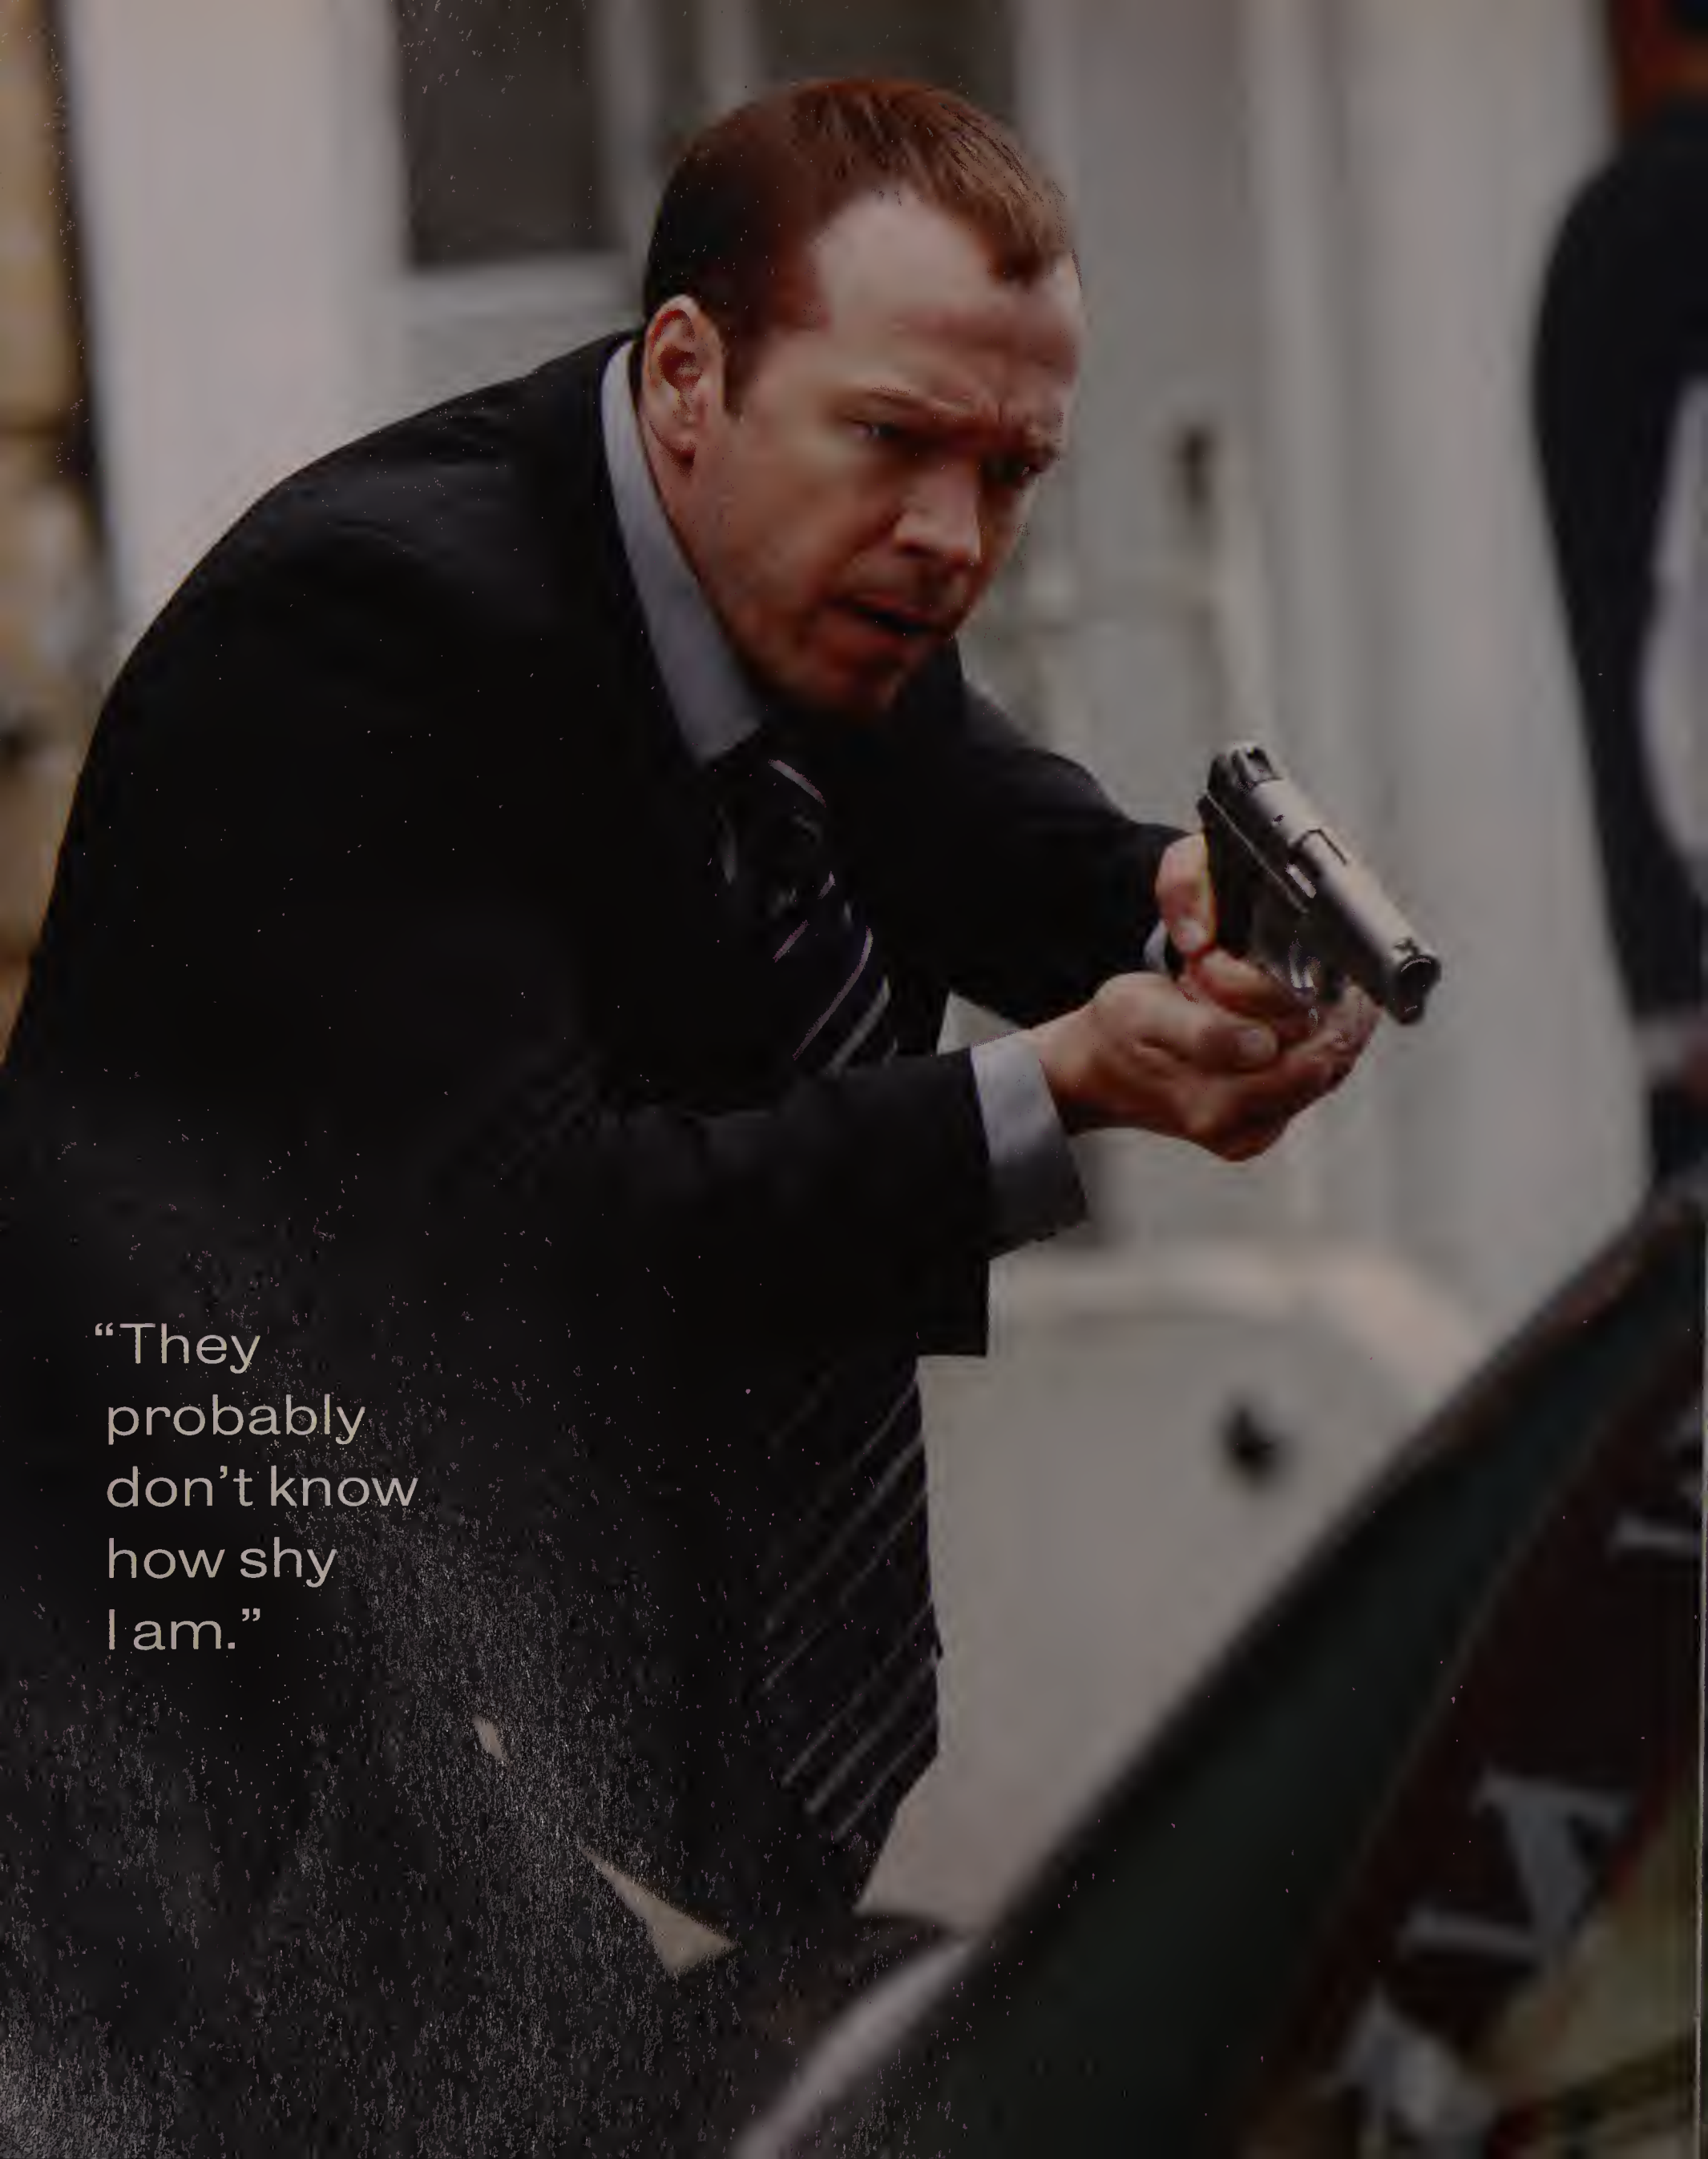
Ask any Upper Crust regular and they'll probably say the thing they love most about our pizza is the tomato sauce. Although, many will say the amazing thin crust, or the imported cheeses, or the custom sausage…

Sorry, back to the sauce:

We actually went to a farm in California, personally selected the types of tomatoes (Roma hybrid), and worked with them to create our very own recipe. It uses fresh tomatoes with fresh herbs and is vacuum sealed then shipped exclusively to us.

It's so delicious the processor pulled us aside to tell us it's the best recipe he has ever tasted. We were flattered. And chose to believe he wouldn't say that to us just because we're a good customer. Hmmm.

Come tell us what you think.



Good Is Easy. Great Isn't.

Soroff On DONNIE WAHLBERG

The actor and pop star talks about celebrity, Tom Selleck's mustache and getting cast as a cop.

MULTI-HYPHENATE DONNIE WAHLBERG, 41, was born and raised in Dorchester and rocketed to superstardom as the bad-boy member of the band New Kids on the Block. After launching his brother Mark's career as a rapper and then an actor, Donnie went on to distinguish himself as an actor and producer. He has appeared on the big screen in the Saw films, Righteous Kill, The Sixth Sense, Southie and Ransom, and on TV in the critically lauded Boomtown and Band of Brothers. He's currently starring in the CBS police drama Blue Bloods and was instrumental in reforming NKOTB, which will tour this summer. He lives in New York.

Jonathan Soroff: So is your costar Tom Selleck keeping his 'stache?
Donnie Wahlberg: My only answer to that is that I'm trying to develop an iconic feature of my own. I'm working on it.

You've got the shaved head thing going.
Yeah, but so does Michael Chiklis. I'm thinking about maybe one sideburn. Or a unibrow. Or a Friar Tuck haircut.

How did you lose your Boston accent?
I brought my older brother Jim on tour right after he quit smoking and drinking. He had to be the most angry, obnoxious person I'd been around in my life, and I realized I sounded like that sometimes. So I had to change it. I realized that if I sounded anything like my brother, I was screwed.

Thing you miss most about Boston?
I miss the air. There's a certain energy there that doesn't exist anywhere else. I can feel it the second the plane touches down and they open the door. I can smell it.

If you could only watch one Boston team for the rest of your life, which would it be?
You're an asshole. [Laughs.] That's just wrong. I guess I'll go with the New England Revolution, because if you think you're going to get me to choose between the Celtics, the Red Sox, the Patriots and the Bruins, you're absolutely out of your mind.

Biggest payday you ever had?
I don't remember the biggest paycheck I ever got, but I do remember the biggest tax check I ever had to deliver. It was seven figures. It was mind-boggling. I'd probably never seen a check for more than a few thousand and, all of a sudden, I was giving one away with seven figures on it. Probably one of the most painful days of my life.

Was your performance in the first six minutes of The Sixth Sense unfairly overlooked?
I'm not really doing this to win awards. I get stopped on the street every single day by people who say they were amazed that was me in that scene. That's reward enough.

You always get cast as a cop. Why?
Every actor plays a cop at least 25 times in their career if they have a long career.

Could you do the job?
The last two times I've played one, the technical advisors, who were two of the best cops in their respective cities, both told me I'd make a great cop. I consider that high praise. So it's pretty cool, and it's become a thing for me on set to try and figure out what they're going to tell me before they do—like leaving a weapon outside of an interrogation room, or how to stand when someone may be threatening. It's interesting as an actor how much of that is instinctive, and I love when the technical advisor says, "How'd you know to do it that way?"

Most bizarre fan encounter?
I just remember this one fan who always used to show up and give us these clearly poisonous cupcakes. It was pretty scary.

What's up with the Funky Bunch?
They're actually working together in Boston, working on some new stuff, recording.

Career achievement you're most proud of?
Helping launch my brother Mark's career. When I think about the alternatives… I actually get chills thinking about what might've been if I hadn't put him in a recording studio all those years ago. I can't help but imagine I'd be visiting him in prison somewhere.

Is there anyone you'd never work with again?
I guess Jamie Kelly, the kid who quit New Kids. [Laughs.] Seriously? No. I've learned something from everyone I've ever worked with, even if it was learning what not to do.

Do you let your kids watch the Saw movies?
Sure. My oldest son has the poster in his bedroom. When Saw II came out, he was the most popular kid in high school because of that.

When are you and Mark going to star in a movie together?
No idea. But maybe someday, I hope.

Most annoying part of being a celebrity?
There's always that point when you're feeling at your lowest, most vulnerable or grumpiest, and it never fails that at that exact moment someone recognizes me.

Best thing you ever read about yourself in a tabloid?
That I almost died in a car wreck. The headline was this sensational "Donnie Wahlberg Nearly Dies in a Car Crash!" The article said I almost fell asleep at the wheel. I guess the reasoning was that because something almost happened, a whole chain reaction of almost disasters almost took place. The best part was that some reality show about celebrity near-misses or near-death experiences wanted me to do an episode about this non-incident.

Thing your fans would be most surprised to know about you?
They know everything about me. But if I had to guess, I'd say they probably don't know how shy I am deep down inside.

What's going to come first: Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, Emmy or Oscar nomination?
If any of that happened, I'd be very, very proud, but I don't think about that stuff. If I spent my time thinking about things that might happen in the future, I'm missing out on what's happening right now. That's one of the lessons I've learned getting a second chance in the music business. I'm enjoying it all too much to focus on the maybes. ✖✖✖

A QUEST FOR FRIED TRANSCENDENCE

GOING FOR GOLD

THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT THAT perfect bite, the crunchy exterior and full aroma that makes even the healthiest eater surrender to the power of the deep fryer. Fat has an undeniable magnetism. But why?

Since a call to the patron saint of fried food, Paula Deen (a woman who once fried butter), wasn't returned, the best option was an expert with more classical training. Rachel Black, assistant professor and coordinator of the gastronomy program at Boston University, credits our craving for the greased to instinct. "It's fatty, salty and crunchy," she says. "We're biologically programmed to gravitate towards those three things." Mozzarella sticks are, it seems, in our blood.

Of course, nutritional science has clearly defined the health risks associated with frying, and anyone who's trying to argue against them probably has stock in the canola oil industry. Sure, a plate of steamed green beans and a piece of salmon might be more vitamin-packed than a bowl of onion strings, but fried food is still comfort food at its most approachable.

And delicious. If you're going to indulge, spike your cholesterol with one of these delicacies. "Everything in moderation" is sage advice, especially when you remember that "everything" includes moderation itself.

ONION STRINGS AND THE POWDERHOUSE

Onion strings certainly aren't unique to Trina's Starlite Lounge, but they're one of the reasons Bostonians make the trek to the Inman Square hotspot. Served overflowing in a bowl just slightly too small, the strings ($4) don't even require dipping sauce. A simple flour breading coats each super-thin slice of onion, fried into a tangled mess, then salted and seasoned. "The natural accompaniment to fried food is beer," says co-owner Josh Childs, pairing them with the Powderhouse ($9), a shot of Old Grand-Dad whiskey with a Carling Black Label chaser. The Grand-Dad packs enough heat to put hair on the chest of Justin Bieber, and it stands up to the onions' grease. "In today's health-conscious era, people want to break the rules when they go out," Childs adds. "Sometimes it's fun to indulge and not take everything so seriously."

CRISPY PIG'S HEAD CAKE AND THE ALKALI RIDGE SUNSET

The nose-to-tail cooking trend may have hit its peak, but at Russell House Tavern, the odd parts of a beast remain sacred. With his pig's head cake, chef Michael Scelfo takes an intimidating cut and turns it into something approachable. "I'm always looking for ways to get people to try new things," he says. "They're really buying into this one." The crab-cake-like patty ($9), filled with moist meat, is deep fried and topped with a poached egg, then served on a puddle of maple and ginger aioli. Bar manager Aaron Butler created the Alkali Ridge Sunset ($12) to bring out the maple flavors. The cocktail, a mixture of High West "Bourye" whiskey and citrus notes, marries the flavors and helps cut through the thick dressing.

FRIED KUMAMOTO OYSTER AND SHICHI HON YARI SAKE

Japanese cuisine might not be the first to spring to mind when you're craving something fried and fatty, but O Ya's Tim and Nancy Cushman are masters of the unexpected delight. Their buttermilk- and Parmesan-battered Kumamoto oyster ($14) is just a single morsel, but it explodes with a burst of rich, briny broth and a series of different temperatures and textures, thanks in part to a topping of cold squid-ink bubbles. For a pairing, Nancy reaches for Shichi Hon Yari's junmai sake ($38) because of its full body. "This is the least refined sake we have in-house, and the oyster has such a strong flavor, it really needs something tough," she says. Cooler notes of melon counter the heat of the oyster's chile-citrus laced aioli.

WINTER POUTINE AND THE ABATTOIR

When the Québécois created poutine in the late '50s, it's unlikely they had Gallows chef Seth Morrison's updates in mind. His South End gastropub offers a variety of gravy-laden fries, but the most intriguing is the rotating seasonal option ($14). For winter, hand-cut potatoes are topped with vegetarian mushroom gravy and blanketed in root vegetables, roasted until caramelized and sweet. In lieu of the usual curds, ricotta-like cheese adds a bright, lemony creaminess. Bar manager April Wachtel recommends sipping an Abattoir ($9) while snacking. This veal-stock-based cocktail has received a lot of hype, which she credits to the "unusual and incredibly complex" flavor. Any fears of gulping cold beef stew are washed away by its subtle meatiness and a final bite of black pepper.

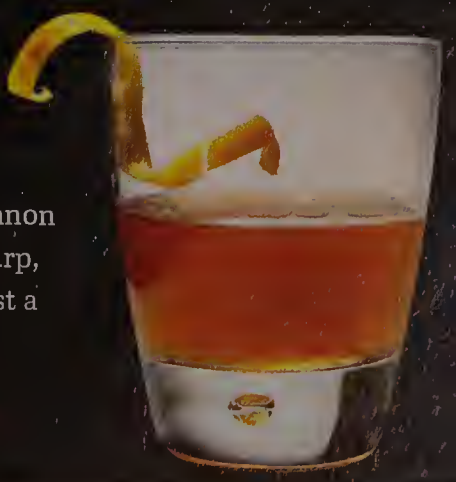
GARBANZOS FRITOS AND THE TORRENS

Estragon chef Julio de Haro's fried chickpeas ($5) combine crunch with just the right dosage of grease. "It's a very simple preparation with delicious results," he says of this infinitely superior version of bar nuts. "They're coated with paprika, and that's a very unique flavor." Guests can nosh on this popular snack while flipping through co-owner Lara Gavigan's personal collection of books, or try their hand at the guitar. To temper the garbanzos' spice without watering it down, bartender Sahil Mehta created the Torrens ($7), a beer-based cocktail using a pale ale with notes of rye and lemon. To bulk up the citrus, he adds brandy that's been house-infused with caramelized oranges and lemons. The result is a bright, effervescent sip that wipes away any dryness the chickpeas leave on the palate.

HAM AND CHEESE BITES AND THE BLINKER



The folks at Met Back Bay have a passion for ham and cheese. Downstairs, pork enthusiasts huddle around a bar dedicated to the duo, where domestic cures and cultures scent the air. Tableside, opt for the ham and cheese bites ($9), a grown-up version of those cheese poppers you find in the freezer section. "They're the perfect combination of salty and tangy," chef Todd Winer says. "We took something so simple and made it sophisticated. Ham and cheeses are a part of the American heritage. It's America at its best." The raspberry flavor of the Blinker ($13) is a perfect accompaniment, with an underlying taste of rye enhancing the savor. A final flourish of grapefruit cleanses the palate with a bitter snap.

FRIED OLIVES AND THE SAZERAC ITALIANO

Fried dishes don't take up much room on chef Jody Adams' menu at Rialto, a haven for fresh produce and old-school techniques. But the fried olives ($4), a recipe handed down from her father, have topped the bar menu for three years. "They're crispy, salty and fatty," she says of the dish's perennial appeal. "The olives hit all the instincts and have a very extreme flavor." Stuffed with Pecorino cheese and assorted Italian meats (they change regularly, depending on what's in-house), the olives are covered in a simple breadcrumb coating and cooked to a dark, nutty brown. Bartender Shannon Guilmet's Italian take on a Sazerac ($10) is lemony and sharp, with spiced honey syrup and Old Overholt rye. It brings just a touch of heat, burning away the cheese's remnants of salt.

FRIED CLAMS AND NARRAGANSETT LAGER

Those other bivalves made Island Creek the go-to for locally harvested seafood, but the fried clams at its Kenmore Square flagship are perfectly executed summer fare, served year-round. Served on a bed of French fries with a side of coleslaw and a pickle-juice-spiked tartar sauce, the South Shore clams ($15–$27) are beyond plump and meaty. "Throughout the menu everything is about quality," general manager Tom Schlesinger-Guidelli says. "It's not that we prepare our oysters all that differently, it's that we're using the best possible seafood." Keeping with the classic motif, he skips the cocktail list and completes the meal with a Narragansett tall boy ($5), adding, "That's a no brainer. It's light and local, basically summer waiting to happen."

FOIE GRAS & DOUGHNUTS AND THE DOUBLE BLACK

It's hard to make a doughnut more gluttonous, but Will Gilson has found a way. At Garden at the Cellar, the small (and typically jam-packed) restaurant he's headed since 2007, Gilson's become a local legend for his use of ultra-fresh herbs and produce, not to mention his ability to give a highbrow interpretation to a decidedly lowbrow dish. His seared foie gras and doughnuts ($13) arrives surrounded by seasonally appropriate accoutrements—say, candied hibiscus, crystallized ginger, cocoa nibs and a bright blood-orange reduction. "I had a lot of trouble selling foie gras in Cambridge, even though it's been on the menu since we opened," Gilson says. "I had a joke with my sous chef about pairing it with something ridiculous, and it took off." To drink, Gilson recommends the Double Black ($10), an herbal mix of Kahlua, Fernet and orange bitters. It's coffee and doughnuts, refined.

DEEP-FRIED MARS BAR AND ALBA SCOTS PINE ALE

In this country, fried candy bars are typically reserved for faraway state fairs and theme parks, so many Bostonians have never indulged in the vice. Jason Waddleton, owner of the Haven in Jamaica Plain, considers them a taste of home. A fried Mars bar ($5) is a standard chip-shop dessert in his native Scotland, but he's improved the dish for local palates. "We sprinkle the batter with salt after it comes out of the oil to really bring out the flavor," he says. "And we serve it with maple whipped cream, which adds even more decadence." The maple pairs with the woodsy notes of Williams Brothers Brewery's Alba Scots Pine Ale ($7), a light, effervescent brew that doesn't add weight to a dish that already toes the cloying line. Waddleton finds fried foods so popular on his menu that he's recently added a weekly all-fried night. "They're smaller portions, so you can have a few without feeling like you're doing something bad. But when you're eating fried foods," he continues, "sometimes that's half the fun."

DEEP-FRIED TWINKIES AND THE BOURBON ROOT BEER FLOAT

After you've enjoyed all of chef Marco Suarez's offerings at Canary Square, there's only one realistic option for dessert. Deep-fried Twinkies ($7), battered and dusted in powdered sugar, are a gluttonous take on the lunchbox standard. One bite into the oozing center will convince you that Twinkie isn't just a byword for chemical preservatives. Playing to the nostalgia factor, co-owner Michael Moxley recommends sipping a Bourbon Root Beer Float ($9) with the Hostess treat. "We use a lot of local ingredients," says Moxley, pointing out the J.P. Licks ice cream and the Tower root beer. Knob Creek bourbon rounds out the mix. "The pairing has the flavor profiles of stuff that many adults haven't enjoyed since they were kids, and they remember how delicious it was."

Is tequila reaching its saturation point?

CROWDED HOUSE

TEQUILA PACKS THEM IN AT BARS LIKE LOLITA..

EVERY EVENING AT THE Back Bay hotspot Tico, a dapper, professional scrum pushes up against the patinaed bar. They're here for the food and the ambience—spicy, varied, with unexpected twists like gothic Spanish lamps and mango in the quail a la plancha. But they're also here for the tequila, our city's newest favorite tipple. In the past few months, Boston has seen the launch of tequila-slinging venues like Tico, Lolita and Fort Point's Papagãyo. Mija Cantina and Temazcal loom on the horizon. There's obviously money to be made in the fruits of the agave—on its first Friday in business, Tico's bar poured some 400 made-to-order margaritas.

With tequila varieties at many of these restaurants numbering more than 100 (Sushi-Teq has 102, Papagãyo and Mija Cantina 150 each, Lolita boasts 195, Temazcal a borderline-abstract 300 bottles), bar managers have faith in the drink's appeal. "Everyone has a tequila these days, even Justin Timberlake," says Papagãyo co-owner Brad Dalbeck, who'll soon head to Mexico to select and brand a barrel of tequila for the house. Bartenders say customers choose their poison based on bottle design ("It's like picking a perfume"), menu tasting notes, familiar brands ("like Patrón"), bartender recommendations or, in the case of Temazcal, from photos, ratings and details about the distilling process on the iPad menu.

We weren't always a tequila town. In 2009, Boston held just 1.1 percent of the national tequila market. Danielle Eddy of the Distilled Spirits Council predicts that, as one of the nation's top cocktail cities, we're now following San Francisco, Chicago and New York's lead in adopting the trend. Between 2002 and 2007, U.S. imports of tequila grew by 48 percent. Sushi-Teq's head chef Tsuyoshi Taki-ishi sees tequila's rise in popularity as part of the ebb and flow of drink trends, starting with vodka bars in the '80s and the more recent resurgence in Scotch's popularity. Nationwide, tequila sales rose four percent between 2009 and 2010. Eddy expects growth to hold in coming years. With 2011's biggest tequila-drinking months ahead (May, July and December) and several bar openings scheduled, we're likely to sip our way up from the number 18 rank in state tequila consumption we achieved in 2009.

"When we opened, most people thought of tequila as a bad memory instead of a quality spirit," says Mohamad Elzein, partner/director of operations at Masa. In the 11 years since it opened in the South End, Masa has quietly worked to revamp tequila's image from frat-party fuel to luxury libation. Statistics prove that the strategy's working. Nationally, high-end and super-premium brands are up 17 percent since last year. Elzein claims customers are more likely to pick tequilas on account of flavor profile rather than price point, but he says Bostonians are willing to spend. "Between 2003 and now, there's been much more consumption of top-shelf tequila. It's grown every year. Those bottles are moving three, four times faster now," he explains. Says Temazcal's Todd Hall, a winner of two James Beard awards: "Tequila will be the next status symbol."

As the U.S. tequila market evolves, more profits are reinvested in marketing campaigns and experimental distillations. To add character, some distillers are aging tequilas in former port, wine or whiskey barrels (and sometimes the same tequila in multiple barrels, such as Gran Patrón Burdejos Añejo, aged in new French and American oak, then vintage Bordeaux barrels). Others are adjusting batch sizes, creating reserve blends, altering flavor profiles through infusions or developing organic tequilas. The quest for new products and new marketing concepts is, of course, self-perpetuating.

In a tone that's only half-joking, Tico's chef/owner Michael Schlow muses that our arctic winter might've precipitated the trend. "In Boston, we secretly (or not so secretly) covet warmer weather," he says. "So we sip a tequila, listen to a Latin soundtrack and pretend it's not four below outside." Ultimately, though, Schlow and many of his compatriots agree that the surge in Latin restaurants is due, in part, to the wretched economy. Ingredients and startup costs are relatively approachable for business owners, especially since customers now expect large portions for a moderate price. "Just look at Qdoba and Anna's," Schlow says. "Now Boston is familiar with Mexican food. It's everywhere."

Dire economic times, too, demand an uplift. Chris Jamison, co-owner of Lolita, explains, "We were trying to create a dangerous, sexy, decadent, rock 'n' roll party with an upbeat, upscale atmosphere. And tequila is a party liquor in a way that Scotch, gin and even vodka aren't."

Of course, restaurants like Sunset Cantina, Olé and La Verdad have dished up Mexican food and tequila drinks for years, but even the established places have to meet the demands of the trend. Masa's tequila list has grown from 45–50 tequilas to just above 100. Its list is carefully curated, and bartenders steer customers on the assumption of little prior knowledge of the drink. "A gin drinker will probably like a tequila that's peppery and herbal, whereas an ultra-añejo tequila can be mistaken for a good Scotch," says Elzein.

Like a wine list, Masa's tequila roster aims to offer a sense of place, specifically "where the blue agave was grown—the highlands or the lowlands—and approach it with the concept of terroir." Temazcal's Hall, too, links flavor with geography. "You can taste the earth in a great tequila, literally. It's supposed to be savored. We're not serving some unaged tequila with a handful of salt and five limes. They're aged, buttery and nuanced." The idea is to usher in an age of tequila enlightenment, like in the 1980s, when Americans put away the white zinfandel and uncorked the cabernet.

As with a good wine list, Schlow insists, "Man and woman cannot live by one or two tequilas alone." As customers become more educated, he explains, they move from cocktails to neat drinks. ("These are not tequila shots. They're for sipping.") Elzein agrees, explaining that his customers then use their knowledge of specific tequilas to select nuanced cocktails. Stepping past the margarita, consider the Paloma (Schlow's favorite), the Bloody Maria or icy granitas.

ANY WAY YOU SLICE IT
CHEF TAKI-ISHI OF SUSHI-TEQ

IT'S ONLY A MATTER OF TIME BEFORE HIPSTERS MAKE TEQUILA POST-MODERNIST.

Tequila, too, has started to seep into the menu. Papagãyo makes a pan-seared shrimp penne with a tequila-lime reduction. Sushi-Teq's Taki-ishi formulated a sweet yuzu-and-tequila-based soy sauce that dresses some of the dishes at the InterContinental Hotel's Tokyo-meets-Jalisco restaurant. Self-declared "purist" Hall, however, frowns on that tack. "Tequila isn't something you pair with food," he insists. "Pairing is supposed to enhance and accent." The potency of tequila, he claims, ends up just smothering flavors.

As with any subject involving taste and money, there's going to be disagreement. "It's a spirit that fits many different narratives," Lolita's Jamison says. His restaurant is a self-declared "office professional by day, punk nymphette by night." Foxwoods' Scorpion Bar is a gothic, Mexican rock club. Mija Cantina will be loungey. Tico is relaxed sophistication. Temazcal promises tradition with a high-tech touch. What they have in common is a defining liquor.

And then, when some yet-undreamed tequila bar in Boston unveils the last, undiscovered bottle of añejo to come out of Mexico, what next? Bergamot just put lemon beignets atop tequila ice cream. It's only a matter of time before hipsters make tequila postmodernist. Are we just one margarita cupcake with triple-sec icing away from inciting a detached-ironic-indie-yuppie rebellion? (Kickass Cupcakes, we need to talk.) In other words, is this bacon all over again? Will some satanic liquor store soon be selling tequila-that's-actually-a-shirt (à la Johnny Cupcakes), vodka-flavored tequila (über-meta) and bottles with blank labels (pencil in your own brand)?

Still, like bacon and cupcakes, there's a reason for the popularity. Tequila is fun. Tequila is complex. Tequila is delicious. Fashion or food trend, for the moment the city remains intrigued.

Your move, margarita-flavored bacon. ×××

SOUL OF THE MACHINE

DEATH AND THE POWERS: The Robots' Opera, a marriage of music and mathematics from composer and MIT professor Tod Machover, is possibly Boston's first performance involving "operabots," "hyperinstruments" and animatronic furniture. A collaboration between the heavy-hitting Chicago Opera Theater, MIT's Media Lab and the A.R.T., the show follows a dying man who downloads himself into "the System," hoping to defeat death and leave a legacy for his family. The set features a 40-foot-wide musical "chandelier" that responds to electromagnetic "conducting," in addition to a bevy of LCD walls and the aforementioned Pavarotti-bots. Smart phones suddenly seem a touch prosaic. KATHLEEN GODBOLD

From the Hip

Sun Salutations You may recognize "The Age of Aquarius" as the finale number from The 40-Year-Old Virgin, but before it was Steve Carrell's signature tune, a bunch of hippies belted it out on Broadway in Hair. Recently revived by Diane Paulus, the musical follows a group of flower children who get caught in the crosshairs of the Vietnam War. They'll park the VW van at the Colonial Theatre March 22–April 10.

Movies Edited by Kyle Wright

Capsules by Sean Burns

The Adjustment Bureau ★★ Based on a short story by Philip K. Dick, whose brain-twisting existential malaise has already influenced films like Blade Runner and Minority Report, The Adjustment Bureau stars Matt Damon as David Norris, a cocky young politician. In the men's room rehearsing his concession speech, he meets a blowsy party-crasher played by Emily Blunt, kicking off a delightful back-and-forth of screwball banter. These crazy kids belong together, but the science-fiction plot says otherwise. Enter the Adjustment Bureau, a collection of awesome character actors in fedoras bumping into people and causing so-called coincidences. Answering to somebody who's supposed to maybe be God, they work like trenchcoat-clad angels, taking orders from memos delivered in faded manila envelopes. Their superpowers are arbitrary and depend on the whims of the plot, which is all just an excuse for more classically Dick-ish debates on predetermination versus free will. Apparently magic fedoras allow access through secret doorways that teleport you across entire city blocks. But you know who's really good in this movie? Matt Damon. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Biutiful ★ ½ The Bataan Death March of art-directed sorrow, director Alejandro González Iñárritu's fourth feature wallows in hopelessness, rubbing your nose in filth, sadness and despair so suffocating it becomes comical. Javier Bardem stars as Uxbal, a two-bit hustler just barely scraping by on the ugly side of Barcelona and attempting to rescue his kids from their abusive, bipolar mother. She's a part-time hooker who's also sleeping with Uxbal's sleazy, obese brother when she's not busy slapping around the children. Uxbal also happens to be dying of prostate cancer... and can talk to dead people. But that doesn't figure into the story as much as you might expect. Or really, at all. For all his formal brio, Iñárritu is at a complete artistic dead end, fixated on the inherent nobility of suffering without a larger point to make. Biutiful lumbers toward a preordained, pitiless conclusion without a single organizing idea or overarching theme besides the uninspired notion that life can really suck sometimes, and eventually you die. (At Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Black Swan ★★★★ Flirting with ridiculousness on its way to the sublime, Black Swan is either the greatest stupid movie I've seen all year, or the stupidest great movie. Such petty distinctions hardly matter when you're caught up in its headlong rush. Natalie Portman stars as a stunted porcelain ballerina living in a cramped apartment with her stage mommy (Barbara Hershey), until she gets the role of a lifetime playing both the virginal white swan and her slatternly black counterpart in her company's latest production. Down the rabbit hole we go, getting a first-person view of her escalating mania, thanks to director Darren Aronofsky's dizzying technique. Keeping the camera claustrophobically close to his heroine, he cuts and jumps while cranking up the Grand-Guignol music cues. Walls of mirrors hammer home the doppelgänger themes. Shot on 16mm by the brilliant Matthew Libatique, the film's palette retreats into high-contrast blacks, whites and blood-reds as we descend into chaos. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Cedar Rapids ★★ ½ A stunted man-child's journey (The Office's Ed Helms) from a small town to a medium-sized city for an insurance convention begins by mining lame hick humor, like Helms' gobsmacked awe at economy-motel accommodations. But director Miguel Arteta's latest feature gets better as it goes along, thanks mostly to the contributions of a stellar supporting cast. Helms' good-natured rube slowly brings out the best in his sad-sack colleagues, who swarm to the annual industry gathering as an excuse to drink heavily in soul-deadening chain restaurants and party hard as a vacation from their miserable lives and collapsed dreams. An unrecognizable Anne Heche costars as a disarmingly matter-of-fact adulteress, but the movie belongs to John C. Reilly as a bloated backslapper who laughs way too loud at his own vulgar jokes. Reilly is an Arthur Miller character for the Apatow era. Too bad Cedar Rapids slinks away from his despair in favor of a formulaic happy ending. His performance deserved a braver movie. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Company Men ★★ Acclaimed TV director John Wells' feature debut deals with the plight of downsized business execs, but with around 10 percent of the country out of work, it's tough to feel torn up about Ben Affleck having to sell his Porsche. Despite the contributions of brilliant

PLAIN JANE

There's nothing new in the 1,000th retelling of Brontë's tale.

JANE EYRE ★★
Starring Mia Wasikowska, Michael Fassbender, Jamie Bell, Sally Hawkins and Judi Dench. Based on the novel by Charlotte Brontë. Directed by Cary Joji Fukunaga. At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.

THERE HAVE BEEN AT LEAST 16 big-screen adaptations of Charlotte Brontë's 1847 novel, Jane Eyre, as well as another dozen or so made for TV. The tale has been prequel-ized and sequel-ized several times, most memorably in Jean Rhys' Wide Sargasso Sea (which scored its own naughty NC-17 adaptation back in 1993, plus a slightly classier BBC translation in 2004). Jane Eyre has spawned ballets, operas, a symphony and even a comic book. I'd also be derelict in my critical duties if I didn't mention Val Lewton and Jacques Tourneur's 1943 take on the material: I Walked With a Zombie.

With these iconic roles already assayed by Orson Welles, Joan Fontaine, Colin Clive, Elizabeth Taylor, George C. Scott, Susannah York, William Hurt, Charlotte Gainsbourg, Anna Paquin, Samantha Morton, Ciaran Hinds, Timothy Dalton and even Andrea Martin and Joe Flaherty on SCTV, is there anything more that could possibly be gleaned from spending yet another couple hours with Jane and Mr. Rochester?

Director Cary Joji Fukunaga's 2011 take is dutiful, for the most part adequate and, as far as I can see, has absolutely no compelling reason to exist. Scripted by Moira Buffini, who last year penned Stephen Frears' dreadful countryside farce Tamara Drewe, the movie hits every expected CliffsNotes highlight, streamlining the story but offering no fresh insight or contemporary resonance—which I foolishly assumed was the reason artists revisited classic works in the first place.

Fukunaga helmed 2009's gritty immigration drama Sin Nombre, which struck this viewer as another one of those MTV music videos for poverty that were all the rage back in the City of God/Slumdog Millionaire era. He initially attempts to shake up the text with some rough-hewn naturalism, fixating on the Derbyshire landscapes and overplaying the miserable weather. The shots are handheld and often underexposed, announcing from the outset that this isn't your mom's Jane Eyre.

Except it really is. Once you look past the shaky-cameras and ugly costumes, there's nothing new. We begin with young orphaned Jane (deftly played by Amelia Clarkson) facing a litany of abuse and being locked in the red room by nasty Mrs. Reed (Sally Hawkins, temperamentally a very long way from her turn in Happy-Go-Lucky). Things go from bad to worse when Jane's shipped off to the Lowood School, where she learns how to take a beating from the headmistress and watches her best friend die of typhus.

Upon her eventual graduation from this miserable pit, Jane lands a job as governess at Thornfield Hall. She also appears to have misplaced her personality somewhere amid all these expository flashbacks. Clarkson plays the young Jane as a raging spitfire, with the precocious guile of a Manny & Lo–era Scarlett Johansson (if you can remember that brief period before she started acting with her curves). But, replaced by it-girl Mia Wasikowska for the adult segments, Jane becomes inert. Staring vacantly into space and offering a single facial expression that indicates bewilderment, it's a drastically different performance than the one we were watching before. It's also a dull one.

Luckily, Michael Fassbender is there to liven things up as the moody Mr. Rochester. Wearing some extremely unfortunate, pubic-looking sideburns, this wry Irish actor offers a less operatically tormented Rochester than Welles' legendary turn, instead playing up the character's lazy contempt for everyone in his company. He's perpetually in a snit, with a devastating quip for every occasion, and it's a treat to watch Fassbender thawing into his unexpected feelings for this mouthy governess.

If only Jane were as mouthy as he claims. Fukunaga's Jane Eyre quickly becomes one of those movies where the supporting characters spend the majority of their screen time telling the lead how great he or she is, without any of those admirable traits being visible to the viewer. Judi Dench is on hand to shovel heaps of exposition and to compliment Jane at every turn. Billy Elliot's Jamie Bell appears, smitten with what he calls "her spirit" and gets stranded in the kind of role Colin Firth used to play 15 years ago, back when he was every woman's second choice.

Wasikowska, who also appeared in The Kids Are All Right and that dire Alice in Wonderland thing, has a sizable critical fanbase, but I'm baffled by her appeal. There's none of the backbone and fortitude we keep hearing that Jane has in spades. For the most part she just blandly stands around, suffering from Fukunaga's ugly natural lighting and deliberately drab color scheme.

Perhaps Amelia Clarkson will be old enough to finish the job as the adult Jane when the inevitable remake comes around in another five or six years. ✖✖✖ cinematographer Roger Deakins, The Company Men has a distinctly small-screen sensibility, often feeling like an entire season of one of Wells' polished dramas (ER, The West Wing) whittled down to feature length. It also feels inauthentic, a combination of talking points and statistics missing the grace notes of real-life experience. Adding to the ersatz pallor is Hollywood's recent, unfortunate affinity for terrible Boston accents. Like an English drawing-room drama spoken in Cockney slang, The Company Men's moneyed, white-collar MBA's all drop their R's and bellow profanity like extras from The Fighter. (At the Somerville Theatre and in the suburbs.)

Drive Angry ★★ ½ There's a thin line between clever and stupid, and Nicolas Cage seems to have recently devoted his career to walking it. Drive Angry, this month's Cage craptacular, is exuberant garbage, aware of its own trashiness without ever tipping into camp. With a twinkle in his eye, Cage strains to keep a straight face as John Milton, a black-denim-clad monosyllabic badass who breaks out of hell to rescue his baby granddaughter from a satanic cult. Believe it or not, the movie gets more ridiculous as it goes along. Directed by Patrick Lussier, who helmed 2009's equally low-rent 3-D opus My Bloody Valentine, Drive Angry exploits the extra dimension for severed body parts and the jiggling female form. Much like Pirahna 3-D, the movie makes a strong case that this technology might best be suited for gimmicky shlock. Unfortunately, all the muscle cars, naked women and gratuitous mayhem become a bit wearying by the final reel. This kind of thing should ideally be closer to 80 minutes than 104. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Fighter ★★★ A low-budget labor of love for producer/star Mark Wahlberg, The Fighter follows The Town and Conviction in last year's Massachusetts Lampoon Show, in which glamorous movie stars drop their R's and wear tacky clothes to convey "authenticity." Blue-collar Bostonian has replaced redneck as Hollywood's white-trash signifier of choice. Based on the true story of Lowell boxing legend "Irish" Micky Ward, the film stars Wahlberg as the long-suffering anchor of a spectacularly dysfunctional family. As his troubled brother, Christian Bale bellows into the camera—bug-eyed with rotten teeth—and gives the kind of terrible performance that wins Academy Awards. But The Fighter turns out to be a pretty good movie, especially when Bale is off-screen. The film never strays too far from traditional sports-movie formula, but director David O. Russell imbues the clichés with manic energy, shooting from unexpected angles and eliciting subtle, heartfelt performances from Wahlberg and Amy Adams, who hold the center of this circus with quiet dignity. It gets better as it goes along. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Hall Pass ★ ½ The Farrelly Brothers' decade-long wallow in irrelevance continues with this sad spectacle, which stars Owen Wilson and Jason Sudeikis as a couple of dorky suburbanites granted a week's vacation from the vows of marriage by their exasperated better halves. The problem that has plagued every Farrelly movie since their twin triumphs—Kingpin and There's Something About Mary—is that the copious gross-outs feel obligatory. The brothers have been self-consciously trying to outdo the hair-gel joke since 1998, getting bigger and ruder while simultaneously neglecting the construction that made those set-pieces the stuff of legend. Shot like a sitcom, with unconvincing Georgia locations standing in for Rhode Island and the Cape, this garishly overlit film lacks any semblance of real human behavior. Outlandish flights of profanity reek of flopsweat, as if the brothers know they've been eclipsed by Judd Apatow but assume that by throwing enough pee-pee and poo-poo at the screen they might catch up. What use is spraying diarrhea all over a wall if you don't follow it up with a punch line? (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Just Go With It ★ ½ Every time Adam Sandler bears his soul and takes a beating at the box office, as with Punch-Drunk Love or the more recent Funny People, he follows up with another five years of blockbuster slop from his Happy Madison crap factory, which grinds out indifferently acted, lowest-common-denominator comedies at a depressingly prolific pace. This latest affront stars Sandler as a caddish plastic surgeon who, for reasons too laborious to explain, forces his long-suffering assistant (Jennifer Aniston) to pretend to be his ex-wife during a trip to Hawaii with a bodacious babe (model Brookyn Decker). Undisciplined and punishingly overlong, the movie oozes misogyny, homophobia and an overall aura of lazy contempt. The lone bright spots are Aniston's barbed line readings, probably because she seems as annoyed by the plot and abrasive characters as we are. I daresay she's never been so human and relatable onscreen. Too bad the movie only decides she's worthwhile as a person after she puts on a bikini. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

I Saw the Devil ★★ ½ The subgenre of gonzo Korean revenge dramas reaches some sort of height (or low) with this thoroughly nasty piece of work from director Kim Ji-woon, whose gory spaghetti western The Good, The Bad, The Weird was one of 2008's looniest treats. Oldboy's Choi Min-sik stars as a serial killer who makes the mistake of dismembering the pregnant wife of Lee Byung-hun's secret agent. Let's just say the grieving widower doesn't cope well, ensnaring the killer in an array of ever-deadlier torture traps, practicing a truly twisted catch-and-release strategy that always allows his prey to just barely escape, so his grueling vendetta can start all over again. Kim excels with individual set-pieces that are hardly for the squeamish; a severed Achilles tendon and cannibalism are but the tips of many icebergs. But the movie falters when trying to have its cake and eat it too. There's a hectoring tone that feels phony and at odds with his exuberant staging of bloodshed. (At Kendall Square.)

The King's Speech ★★ ½ Rocky for stutterers, director Tom Hooper's film is a perfectly acceptable middlebrow diversion, the kind of British delight that hoovers up Oscars without leaving much of a lasting impression (see also: Shakespeare in Love). Colin Firth stars as stammering King George VI, who must warily assume the throne after some extramarital shenanigans by his brother throw the monarchy into crisis. Timid and tongue-tied, Firth seeks the counsel of Geoffrey Rush's oddball speech therapist, as this newfangled invention called the radio requires our leaders to be articulate. Slyly grafting an amusing anecdote onto a large historical

Love and Other Drugs

Doctor Feel Good When Liz Canner was working as a film editor for a company trying to produce the female equivalent to Viagra, she didn't realize what was hiding beneath the sheets. Orgasm, Inc. follows the documentary filmmaker as she exposes a part of the medical industry that creates diseases just to make money fixing them. This peek into the science of female satisfaction is an informative tale of profit-hungry corporations, and shows it may be safer to stick to the classic way of getting things done. The drama climaxes on March 24 at the Coolidge Corner Theatre. Hilary White canvas, The King's Speech feigns an importance it doesn't earn. The movie does, however, contain some nicely calibrated performances and droll asides. Too bad Hooper shoots it all with distracting fish-eye lenses and oversells the comedy before shoveling on the pathos. Still, it's harmless enough, for this kind of thing. (At Boston Common, Fenway, Kendall Square, Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

Paul ★★ Simon Pegg and Nick Frost's Shaun of the Dead did a remarkable job inserting two goofball slackers into the margins of a zombie apocalypse. It was a tricky send-up that did everything right that their latest, Paul, does wrong. Now starring as a couple of sheltered fanboys looking for UFOs on their way home from Comic-Con, Pegg and Frost (who also cowrote the script) happen upon an actual alien—one that smokes a lot of weed and sounds suspiciously like Seth Rogen. The ensuing road trip is a rather deadening laundry list of nerdy pop-cultural references, mostly content to restage sequences from classic 1980s sci-fi films. Repeating famous catchphrases and posing in familiar settings, these boys have mistaken references for jokes. Director Greg Mottola, who most recently helmed the marvelous Adventureland, has little capacity for broad farce, with gifted comedic performers like Jason Bateman, Bill Hader and Kristen Wiig salvaging stray laughs despite the inconsistent tone. The barrage of in-jokes attempts to flatter the audience, but familiarity breeds contempt. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Social Network ★★★★ You might be put off by the prospect of a movie about Facebook, but remember that Citizen Kane wasn't really about the newspaper industry. Like that classic, The Social Network uses a media magnate as an entry point to a story more concerned with loneliness and megalomania. It plays like gangbusters. The unlikely pairing of heart-on-his-sleeve, West Wing writer Aaron Sorkin and clinically dyspeptic, Fight Club director David Fincher is unexpectedly revelatory. Zipping back and forth in time from dorms to deposition rooms, the movie isn't so concerned with legal questions of authorship as it is with class differences and the concept of a level playing field in our tech-savvy era. The last shot is a doozy, though. Sorkin and Fincher might as well be saying: "I'm sorry, Mr. Kane, but Rosebud has still not accepted your friend request." (In the suburbs.)

True Grit ★★★★ This is the Coen brothers' most conventional, accessible movie. Some people say that like it's a bad thing. In their rip-snorting, devilishly entertaining throwback to Charles Portis' 1968 novel, the Coens tell the story of Mattie Ross (dazzling newcomer Hailee Steinfeld), a young girl who hires boozy marshal Rooster Cogburn (an instantly iconic Jeff Bridges) to hunt down the no-good horse thief that done shot and killed her Pa. What follows is a strange, often violent adventure through a forbidding landscape, accompanied by Matt Damon's flat-out hilarious Texas Ranger, who is never at a loss for (entirely pointless) monologues. Shot by the brilliant cinematographer Roger Deakins in chilly, wintry tones—mostly from Mattie's point of view—True Grit is quietly assured, absent the self-conscious mythologizing of Henry Hathaway's John Wayne version of this very same yarn. There's a pitiless lack of sentiment that doesn't break until the film's final moments, at which point

I frankly fell apart. Lovely. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Unknown ★★★ Apparently Liam Neeson, the husky-voiced oak tree of an actor creeping up on his 60th birthday, has decided to become the next Jason Statham, knocking around a bunch of Eurotrash baddies in some slickly engineered B-pictures. This is not an unwelcome development. Like Neeson's surprise 2008 smash Taken, Unknown is shrewdly crafted Friday-night entertainment—the kind of movie that'll play forever on cable. As a botanist who suffers temporary amnesia after a car accident in Berlin, Neeson finds another man (amusingly played by his Michael Collins frenemy Aidan Quinn) stealing his identity. Conspiracies and righteous pummelings abound, as do the cardboard line readings of Mad Men's January Jones. A goofy timekiller well aware of its silliness, the film boasts fine wide-screen location work and deliciously hammy turns from Bruno Ganz and Frank Langella. The movie knows exactly what it's doing, and does it well. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

STRUNG ALONG

Jazz-fusion icon Stanley Clarke continues to put the bass out front.

The Stanley Clarke Band plays Royale on March 24.

Steven Parke

IT WAS A GREAT DAY FOR JAZZ when singer/bassist Esperanza Spalding snatched the best new artist prize from Justin Bieber at the 2011 Grammy Awards. Adding the Stanley Clarke Band's award for best contemporary jazz album, it became, as Clarke says, "A great day for bass players."

Clarke deserves much of the credit for moving the instrument into the mainstream. With his snappy, nimble attack, he was jazz's first virtuoso of the electric bass in the '70s, both as a solo artist and with the jazz-rock pioneer group Return to Forever.

"That underdog, working-class musician thing that was associated with the bass player, that's completely erased, especially when you see a lot of young kids now who go to school just to learn the electric bass," says Clarke, 59. "That's actually what blows my mind. I come from the generation where if you went to school to study anything about the bass, it was the acoustic bass, with the idea that you'd join an orchestra or teach."

Like Spalding, whom he tapped to sing on his 2007 disc, The Toys of Men, Philadelphia native Clarke began on the acoustic bass, moving from classical studies to playing jazz with Art Blakey, Dexter Gordon and Pharoah Sanders. And when he picked up the electric bass guitar, he kept playing upright acoustic as well.

"I don't want to come off like I'm arrogant," Clarke says from his home studio/office in Topanga, Calif. "But the electric bass is more like a hobby to me. It was something that I played in bands at parties and things. But I studied the acoustic bass."

He'll play plenty of both on the road this year. Clarke missed the Grammy Awards while touring with the latest incarnation of RTF, which should hit Boston this summer. The Stanley Clarke Band plays Royale on March 24 on a cobilled tour with the Victor Wooten Band, featuring the Flecktones virtuoso who formed bass supertrio SMV with Clarke and Marcus Miller.

Clarke says, "When I first started making solo records, there was just a handful of people that had records out as bass players. Now, worldwide, there are thousands." They range from the Hawaiian guy he met whose album cover sported a bass coming out of a pineapple ("I said to myself, 'I know this doesn't sound good,'" Clarke says) to a German group with four bass players. "It was pounding," Clarke recalls.

He goes on to laud the latest edition of RTF, in which he, keyboardist Chick Corea and drummer Lenny White are joined by guitarist Frank Gambale and violinist Jean-Luc Ponty, another '70s veteran who played with Clarke on The Rite of Strings. "I always played the bass," Clarke says. "But I had the mind of a singer or a bandleader. I always knew how to put music together. I was always a composer and always had an ability to rehearse any band."

Clarke notes that they're playing tunes from throughout the RTF catalog as well as members' solo albums on this year's tour. That means Clarke fans can expect to hear his bass-riffing anthem "School Days" as well as the RTF showpiece "No Mystery."

It'll be somewhat the same with the Stanley Clarke Band, which recast "No Mystery" in amped-up form on its Grammy-winning eponymous debut. The album—with keyboardist Ruslan Sirota, drummer Ronald Bruner Jr. and featured guest Hiromi on piano—balances edgy virtuosity in the RTF vein with smoother melodic structures, with bass often taking the lead.

"What I really tried to do was make a record that had a feeling like the records we did in the '70s, which is live and loud—not too loud, but alive," says Clarke, who coproduced much of the album in his home studio. There, he also works on film and TV scores, having amassed credits from the TV series Pee-Wee's Playhouse and movies Boyz 'N the Hood and Romeo Must Die.

"Technology has totally empowered the musician," he says. "As far as being able to deliver product and create a piece of art, this is the best time to be a musician." Even if you're a bassist. "The bass is liberated," says Clarke, who also teaches when he's home, encouraging students to play both electric and acoustic. "It's got its own universe now." ✖✖✖

A Hard Country

Girl On tOpry

Elizabeth Cook and Taylor Swift are both blonde, leggy beauties who belt out toe-tapping country tunes, but the similarities end there. While Swift weeps teardrops on her guitar, Cook uses her steely vocals to sassily confront life's hard truths, from drug addiction to sexism. With diverse influences, her sound ranges from bubblegum pop to headbanging rock 'n' roll, but she wields her homegrown country twang with panache, even when rhyming "booty" and "snooty." Catch her March 20 at Johnny D's.

Rock Beats Paper

Pour Your Art Out While she doesn't reside in a glass house, sculptor Margaret Swan does cast beautiful stones. Her work molding sheet metal helped win her two Massachusetts Artist Fellowships, but it's her use of colored concrete and coal slag to emulate nature that distinguishes her current projects. Exploring the tensions between art, industry and commercialism, her works are on display through April 17 at the Boston Sculptors Gallery.

IT'S TIME AGAIN FOR YOU TO CHOOSE BOSTON'S BELOVED Bartenders

What makes a great bartender?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-cord routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartenders issue.
